COVER

This issue's cover painting, "Boarding Party," by Michael Scott reflects this month's theme quite well. The reveling that is depicted belies a darker intent; by drawing in more merrymakers, these "creative" characters are actually luring their prey closer to them. "Welcome to our parlor," one of the carousers was heard to quip.

3rd Edition— NOT!!!

Dear Dragon,

This spring, TSR will release new versions of the Player's Handbook and the DUNGEON MASTER® Guide. Your catalog states that these will include corrections and additions, but is not a 3rd edition of the AD&D® game. Is this actually so?

Also, I'm wondering about the spells and magical items from the Tome of Magic. Will they be included in the new PHB and DMG?

Paul Jurgens via the Internet

Quite a number of people have contacted TSR recently concerning the new printings of the PHB and DMG. Let me state for the record that these new printings do not represent a 3rd Edition of the AD&D game in any way, shape, or form. (Even just mentioning a new edition of the game makes a lot of people around here start to tremble, fidget nervously, and consider extended vacations.) Seriously, a new edition of the game would be a tremendous amount of work, and before we undertook such a monumental task we'd certainly seek the input of you, the gamers who play the AD&D game, just as TSR did when developing the game's 2nd Edition in the late 1980s.

The new printings serve one simple purpose: to make our game books (and the game itself) look much more attractive. The new printings have easier-to-read layouts and include much more full-color art throughout.

As they are only new printings of the standard 2nd Edition game books (with corrections, fewer typos, etc.), no material from other sources, including the Tome of Magic appears in them.

What gives?

Dear Dragon,

When I heard that issue #215 of DRAGON Magazine had a list of cards for the BLOOD WARS™ card game, I checked and voila! There it was! Oh frabjous joy!

However, upon perusing the list of Battlefields I noticed that four of them: The Ship of Chaos, Shra'kt'lor, Soot Hall, and the Spawning Stone are duplicated. So what gives, folks?

Via the Internet

Well, I tracked down the author of the article in issue #215 (and designer of the BLOOD WARS game), Steven E. Schend, and asked him that very question. He said the error was simply a mistake in copying the card titles into the list. (Don't feel bad, Steven—Z missed it too.) Steven assures me that, with those four exceptions, the list in issue #215 is complete. There are no cards missing. As proof, Steven provided the following breakdown of cards from the game and the first escalation pack to check the list against:

There are 100 Battlefield cards. There are 54 Warlord cards. There are 56 Fate cards. There are 90 Legion cards. There are 34 "chase" cards.

This totals up to 334 cards, the number of cards in the list in issue #215. In order to correct the list in the magazine, simply cross out one of the two entries for each card mentioned above.

Nigel D. Findley Passes Away

Game designer, author, and editor Nigel D. Findley passed away suddenly on February 19, 1995, at his home in Vancouverr British Columbia, Born in Venezuela in 1959 and raised in Spain, Nigeria, the U.S.A., and England, Findley settled with his family in Vancouver in 1969. After schooling and a brief business career, he chose to write full-time in 1990. Findley produced over 100 products in his career, including 12 novels. He wrote for most every game company in the industry including TSR, but is perhaps best known for all his work-both game products and fiction-for FASA's SHADOWRUN* game. He will be missed by his family, friends, colleagues, and readers everywhere. Donations in Nigel Findley's name may be made to the charity of your choice.

Dragonet revisited

Dear Dragon,

I've read with interest your plans to put TSR and DRAGON Magazine on-line. However, as a long-time subscriber to the magazine, I would hope that you never make an article or a feature of the magazine available on-line before the magazine itself reaches subscribers. This would be a great disservice to the readers who do not have access to the Internet.

Peter D. McMullen via the Internet

TSR agrees with you totally, Peter. While it would be impossible to wait for every subscriber to receive the magazine before we upload the files (after all, we have subscribers all over the world), we currently wait until the 25th of the month prior to the cover date of the issue to upload. We think this allows most of our subscribers to receive their magazine before the issue's features appears on-line. If any of our readers feel that this is too long a period to wait for the upload, or too short a period of time for you to receive your magazine, let us know. While we can't affect how quickly the Post Office handles your magazine, we could change our upload date without trouble. This is your magazine, so tell us what you think. —Dale

Rewind & Fast-forward

Let me say right up front that I hate sappy farewells. Long, drawn-out speeches, overviews, monologues, retrospectives, —yuck! These I consider worse than the relatives who've overstayed their welcome and whom you just can't get out the damn door. They have their coats on and are standing in the open doorway, but they just won't stop talking and waving. You hate to be rude and simply slam the door in their faces, but it's mighty tempting.

Why, you might ask, is he talking about farewells? Well, it's been hinted at and bandied about in the pages of this magazine for a few months now. Yes, my transfer to TSR's Games Department has finally come through, and this is the last issue of DRAGON® Magazine that I will edit. Hence the column's title—looking back and looking ahead. Since this is my farewell, I'm feeling compelled to do a sappy retrospective of the time I served—I mean was privileged to work on—DRAGON Magazine. I'm trying to resist, really . . . but . . . I feel, myself . . . weakening . . . Oh, no . . .

I told the thrilling adventure story (yawn) of how I found myself employed by TSR in the fall of 1989 back in the "gang editorial" of issue #200, so I needn't repeat it here. The first issue of the magazine to bear my alliterative name was #151. Doing a little math in my head, that means I've contributed my two cents' worth in the last 67 issues of this magazine. That's just over five and one-half years' worth. I've worked on DRAGON Magazine longer than I've done anything else in my life. (I have no idea what that says about me.)

At TSR, there are other ways to mark the passing of time: the number of departments you've worked for, the number of bosses you've had, and the number of times they moved your office are three favorites. Let's see: I (and DRAGON Magazine) have been in three departments since 1989, I've had at least three publishers, maybe four (all those guys in shirts & ties look alike to me), and I'm typing this in my third office-easily the best of the lot. Of course, soon after I finish this column, they'll boot me out to regions unknown and office #4. (I just hope there are places to hang my prints by M.C. Escher and fantasy artist Ruth Thompson.)

As far as game products go, I've seen the introduction of the SPELLJAMMER®,

AL-QADIM®, RAVENLOFT™, DARK SUN®, and PLANESCAPE® AD&D® game campaign settings, plus the conversion of MYSTARA® campaign, pulled over from the D&D® game. And soon, these will be joined by the BIRTHRIGHT™ campaign. (Look for articles on this in upcoming issues—plug, plug.)

Random highlights and anecdotes from the magazines themselves include:

- Issue #154, which was ready to go to printer on deadline—except for the fact that two vital pieces of color art, including the cover, hadn't arrived yet.
- My picking up the mantle of Jeff Grubb and others when I started writing The Marvel-Phile column, until Steven Schend kindly took it off my hands. (He even got paid for writing them.)
- The Princess Ark column (and later, The Known World Grimoire) by Bruce Heard: possibly the most underappreciated, most creative column the magazine has run in years. Go back and look at all the adventure ideas Bruce crammed into each installment.
- The cover of issue #203: TSR's Fred Fields and freelance illustrator Tim Bradstreet blew us all away (pun intended) with their painting, "Nailed to the Gun," which is unlike any other piece ever to appear on the magazine's cover.
- The theme sections on players' advice, DMs' advice, science fiction, and each October's horror theme: these were my favorite themes to work on because they always inspired me in my own games. Variety truly is the spice of life, especially in games where far too many campaigns are completely interchangeable. I hope these themes reduced the number of such campaigns.
- The yearly magazine seminars at the GEN CON® Game Fair: these were my one guaranteed opportunity to chat with the readers of this magazine, the devoted, intelligent gamers who are constantly looking for new ways to enliven and enrich their game campaigns.
- Issue #189: The issue had an "Exotic Cultures" theme that I'm very proud of. The material on Africa and India opened a lot of eyes (I hope) to the diversity of history and mythology we can draw from for our games. These articles, and the others published since, have served to illustrate a basic gaming tenet of mine: Why bother making up something from scratch if you can just borrow an idea from history, fiction, or even another game?

My all-time favorite short story published while I was on staff: "A Prayer for the Dead" by Deborah Millitello in issue #162. That story has it all: anger, compassion, pathos, revenge, a budding romance, plus moral dilemmas and the consequences inherent in attempting to resolve such dilemmas. I've read that story a dozen times, and it still gets to me today.

I have more than five years' worth of memories that I could relate, but rather than continue this slipshod rambling down memory lane, I'll get to the point. I've met, known, and worked with a lot of people in the last five-plus years, and I'd like to thank each one here and now. Some are contributors, some are artists, some are colleagues, but you're all my friends. Thanks, guys. I cannot praise too highly all the people who've worked with me on this magazine. You folks are a class act, and I've been privileged to work with and learn from you all.

I hope this isn't the last you'll see of me in these pages. In my new duties as a game designer (wahoo!), I sincerely hope to return to these pages with some new ideas for your game, or maybe a preview of an upcoming project that I happened to work on (just like "The Game Wizards" column in this very issue. Wow, just imagine the odds of that happening. It beggars the mind.) Anyway, have fun and take it easy on my successor in this editorial hot seat, Mr. Wolfgang Baur, formerly of DUNGEON® Adventures. I'll let him explain the arcane series of events that led to this domino-like shuffling of personnel some other time. I'll see you at the GEN CON Game Fair this August. Stop by the demo tables in the castle and say hi. Now, in the immortal words of Dennis Miller, "I am outta here!"

Avoiding Happy Hour with Frodyne the Fearless

by Jean Rabe

Frodyne the Fearless. Ah, she was truly an impressive lass—decked out in shining armor and wielding an even more impressive enchanted long sword. Nothing scared her. No one could stop her from risking her life by delving into deadly dungeons. And no power in the kingdom could keep her from protecting innocent citizens endangered by vicious monsters. Of course, along the way Frodyne was not above acquiring a good amount of treasure. One had to be compensated for random acts of derring-do.

Frodyne was my first AD&D® game character and my first experience with a role-playing campaign.

I was attending Northern Illinois University in Dekalb, Illinois, (and majoring in journalism so I could be a great, crusading reporter). Frodyne was a werehawk. Yeah, I know, a non-standard character race, but back then—okay, it was roughly 17 years ago if you're that curious—there weren't as many rule books and non-standard characters seemed the norm.

Anyway, Frodyne was stupid.

I didn't do very well rolling the dice the night she was born, so she had single-digit Intelligence and Wisdom scores that when added together just barely reached double digits. But she was cute, and she could fly, and that latter skill was useful in getting her out of trouble.

She found trouble often.

For example, one evening we were "dungeoning," as we used to call it, and Frodyne had taken the lead. She seemed pretty tough and fearless in her armor, and being somewhat short she insisted on walking in the front of the group so she could get a better look at the surroundings. Turning a corner, she spied a blackrobed man who looked evil. I guess she made a little too much noise in that nice armor, because the black-robed man turned, pointed a bony finger at her, and whispered, "Die." Well, Frodyne wasn't fearless for the first time in her imaginary life. Being a little too young to depart the here and now so quickly, she instantly shifted to her hawk form, leaving her armor clattering on the ground. The cacophony made the evil wizard mad, and he went after the rest of the adventuring group, too—who had just rounded the corner and spotted him.

I'm not sure how all the characters made it out of the dungeon that night. I suspect the DM was being kind and didn't want to waste the rest of the evening with us rolling up new heroes. (How ya doing, Chuck?) So the characters went back to town—angry at Frodyne. She bought a new set of armor—while she profusely apologized to her companions. Everyone returned to the very same dungeon, but this time the characters chose a path away from the black-robed man, and Frodyne didn't walk in the lead.

Chuck was my first DM. He was a tall, bookish genius who lived on the fourth floor in my dormitory. Somehow between all his studies he found time to invent fantastic adventures centered in a world he had created. He had this detailed map sketched out on graph paper, with the major continent looking vaguely like an upsidedown Australia. There were railroad tracks running around much of it, but our group never found them or the train. We did find lots of villains, beasties, and piles of gold coins, though. We got together once a weekend, usually on a Friday or a Saturday night, and sometimes both. We'd play all evening, occasionally into the proverbial wee hours of the morning, with Neil Diamond tunes running in the background. It was great. And it kept us out of the bars.

In fact, avoiding alcohol is how I discovered role-playing. I was never one for "going out drinking," as college kids are notorious for doing. So shortly after the fall semester began I started looking for a weekend pastime that didn't involve traipsing from bar to bar for their two-for-one specials. I'll admit a lot of my college friends were into the American version of pub-crawling, and I'm sure they had a good time, but the scene wasn't for me.

Enter Laura.

She was an education major who lived a few doors down in the dorm. We got to be friends because of a mutual interest in science fiction, and Star Trek in particular. One night she invited me to go "dungeoning" with her and Chuck and some guys on the fourth floor. Intrigued, I said okay, not knowing that evening would eventually propel me to Wisconsin and to a different career than I had intended.

And all because of a role-playing game. Our group of weekend warriors got to be fast friends—meeting in each other's rooms to "dungeon" between study assignments and part-time jobs. We either played in Chuck's world or Laura's, and our adventuring party grew as more of our friends discovered the game. When college ended we parted company, promising to keep in touch, and Chuck gave me his wonderful map with the undiscovered railroad.

I moved to Quincy, Illinois, to be an education reporter for a daily newspaper there. I didn't know anyone in town, and it seemed the only activities the reporters engaged in were softball (men only) and weekend parties filled with kegs of beer (how enchanting). Looking for a hobby and a way to make some friends, I trotted over to a bookstore two blocks from the newspaper offices. The store sold the AD&D game, and I put a notecard on the bulletin board announcing I was looking for a campaign.

A few days later I started getting phone calls, and my weekend nights were soon filled with wilderness expeditions and dungeon crawls. Gee, I love this game. Once again I became fast friends with a wonderful group of people (and I eventually married Bruce, one of the DMs). The gaming club grew to about 60 people, and we met once a week in a large hall at the Illinois Veterans' Home, a retirement community. There, I adopted a grandfather, a 92-year-old staunch Republican named Ralph. One of us had to adopt a grandfather so our gaming group could use the hall free. Being the president of the club, I volunteered. Gaming once again was re-

by Larry Granato

Artwork by Doug Shuler

Players in AD&D® game campaigns usually think of rewards in terms of money and magic because that's what they get experience points for. They use them to defeat monsters. Defeating more monsters gives them more magic and more money, which is used to defeat more monsters, ad nauseum. However, in a well-developed campaign there are many ways a creative Dungeon Master (DM) can reward without shoveling out the platinum, and +3 swords. For instance, the DMG, on page 80, mentions other valuable treasures including lands and titles.

Social status, land, property, businesses, titles, and special privileges are beneficial to all player characters (PCs). It gets them more involved in the campaign setting and can lead to exciting political adventures, such as those in Jan Berrien Berends' article "The Greatest and Most Honorable Adventure" in DRAGON® Magazine issue #196.

These rewards also require the adventurers to be more careful in dealing with nonplayer characters (NPCs), and thus pay attention to their roleplaying. The DM also must take care to develop NPCs as more than stock caricatures who stand around with their hands out. Some players disdain cultivating NPC contacts, thinking they can just bribe their way out of any problem. Money can't buy everything. So, the DM should have NPCs react negatively when PCs put everything in terms of "How many gold pieces?"

As an example, the party could via royal official in hopes of gaining information. While waiting endlessly in anterooms and corridors, paying off lackeys and being shuffled from one underling to another, they see NPCs ushered right through to the official. When they ask why, they can be told that the others have the right contacts at court or belong to prestigious organizations. They worked their way up the social ladder and have earned certain rights and privileges, and the PCs can, too.

Not all rewards need be C.O.D.

The exquisitely dressed Lord Bri'on Chumley looked on as the group of adventurers stood before his noble Duke. "Indeed," the Duke said approvingly from his throne, "as you have proved your mettle by defeating the evil sorcerer who has been plaguing my realm, it is in my mind to grant you a boon." He gazed at the company before him, just a hint of a smile on his face.

"Well," said a brawny, but not-toosmart-looking fighter, "We could sure use 50,000 gold pieces. And, uh, do you have any magic wands . . .?"

Chumley snorted as he watched the Duke's face grow hard. The rudeness and greed of the party was even more distasteful when Chumley thought of the many richer rewards that were available to them—such as membership in the Duke's elite Order of the Lion; his own membership had served Chumley very well for he had been able to meet so many accomplished wizards, priests, and warriors . . .

Although the party may have had some fabulous adventures, if no one has heard about them or they don't have irrefutable proof, their claims are likely to be met with skepticism. ("So you defeated the giants of South Dorking Woods?" the doorman said dryly. "Sorry, I never heard of them. Please be on your way.") When dealing with NPCs who don't know the party, an undeserved reputation for cowardice because of a single unfortunate encounter can hamper the party for months or years in game time.

Rewards in social advancement should be made useful in adventuring rather than just another rating to keep track of, so the players will want to gain these types of rewards. Being able to meet important NPCs who can help the party, not with gold or magic, but with information and influence, is very worthwhile. But, beware who you befriend! NPCs are often members of cliques who have enemies who will criticize the party's association with them.

Powerful NPCs have influence they can use on behalf of PCs. PCs also can acquire influence by becoming well known. In game terms, influence gives favorable reaction roll modifiers. The more influence, the greater the modifier or important the NPC who can be swaved. It doesn't take much influence to impress a butler, but a Duke would require a great deal. The DM should modify influence by such things as the PC's social status, titles, offices, organizations he belongs to, reputation, gifts, bribes, his relationship with the NPC, and, most importantly, how well the situation is role-played.

Influence is used to get favors. When an NPC shows a positive reaction, he may grant the PCs a favor. Naturally, the NPC only can grant a favor that is his to give; the stable-sweeper can't get the PC an audience with the king no matter how good his action roll is. Favors come in man, forms. A favor can be used to have something done in the fastest and most efficient way rather than following the usual bureaucratic routine. It also could be used in making special requests that normally would not be considered. Favors can get people jobs (or prevent someone else from getting the job), get the party out of trouble, get audiences, acquire privileged information, affect the outcome of trials have legislation passed (or blocked), and help them deal with all the intricacies of courts and government.

To a certain extent, favors are transferable from one person to another. However, most NPCs expect that the PC asking for a favor will do them a favor in return. This is a matter of honor, and characters who do not reciprocate will find they quickly lose whatever influence they had. There are many cases in medieval legend and in history of people having to follow through on promises they made against their best interests, simply because they'd given their word, and to renege would be dishonorable.

The following boons and benefits are arranged in order of increasing desirability. Although they are numbered, DM should not roll dice to see what kind of reward a PC gets, but should rather choose the most appropriate benefit, i.e., not only what the character deserves, but something his interests lie toward. For example, a barbarian would not be a good candidate for election to office, while membership in the "Fraternal Order of Mages" would be fitting for an up-andcoming wizard. Some benefits are more applicable to fighters than priests or wizards. It also is important that PCs should earn their benefits.

Some of the benefits that PCs may receive include nonweapon proficiencies (NWPs). The DM decides if the PC gets a "free" NWP slot or uses one that would be available at a higher level. It takes 1-12 months to learn the new proficiency.

Table #l "Honors," Table #5 "Employment" and Table #12 "Miscellaneous" are best used for low level characters. Moderate level PCs could receive Table #3 "Wealth," Table #4 "Real Estate," Table #2 "High Honors," or Table #7 "Business." High level types might receive "Titles" from Table #8, "Feudal Fiefs" from Table #9, or "Elite Employment" from Table #6.

Honors, from Table #I, usually are given to a PC (or a party) who has distinguished himself for a particular deed, or for reliable service over a long period of time. In general, they are of local value only, and if the PC travels far from his home they will be of little use.

Table #2's High Honors make the PC famous over a wider area. A favorable reaction modifier is very likely, and the DM should allow the PC a small amount of influence over the underlings and lackeys he must deal with.

Table #3, #6, and #5, are typically bestowed by a ruler, noble, town, merchant, organization, or guild for some deed the PC's accomplished. It isn't always for killing monsters; writing an excellent poem, song, or book (especially one that praises the ruler), settling a difficult case, solving a perplexing mystery, or hosting a special event are all good reasons.

Wealth is straightforward. Business benefits are more complex, and various types are listed in Table #6. Some, like shares in a ship, can lead to caravan adventures. However, in some lands, it is considered bad form for knights and nobles to engage in business, unless they act as a "silent partner."

Employment is a tricky proposition since the fun in role-playing is in adventuring, not holding down a regular job. Therefore, most jobs are presented as being part-time or seasonal, and can be done between adventures. If this doesn't work, the PC can be appointed as a special assistant or consultant who sets his own hours. If the PC is high-level, he can give the job to a follower.

Real Estate (Table #4) can be given only by a great magnate or a king, typically for services rendered personally, rather than general adventuring.

Table #8, #9, #10, and #12 are benefits that can be granted only by a king or other great lord. These should be used sparingly.

Elite Employment includes prestigious full-time jobs. These are suitable for high-level PCs involved in political campaigns. Otherwise, the PC can be a "minister without portfolio" who works between adventures.

The acquisition of a title ("ennoblement") is extremely rare for commoners, although they are sometimes granted to members of the knightly class. It is not unusual for members of the nobility to gain additional titles. The term "titled noble" suggests that there also are untitled nobles, who as a matter of courtesy, are referred to as "Lord" or "Lady," but have no specific title.

There may be nations where titles can be bought, but the DM should consider that in those places titles are probably rather common and not held in high regard, e.g., after spending thousands of gold to become a count, a PC finds out his coach driver is a prince. (A visitor to Czarist Russia early in this century found his taxi driver indeed was a prince!) Also, the old-blood nobility know very well who the parvenus are, and have nothing but disdain for them.

Feudal Fiefs are given by a king or overlord to vassals who swear fealty to them. Fiefs not only include land, but legal rights over the tenants who reside there. The PC is the judge and chief executive of his fief. He can impose taxes and duties. In return, he must protect the people with his military forces. A PC must be at least a gentleman or squire to receive fiefs #1-3, a knight for #4-5, a noble for #6-9, and a high-ranking noble for #10 or higher. Most PCs will wish to create their own freeholds, and it would not be unusual for a ruler to grant them a fief along a border or wilderness area that is largely undeveloped. Fiefholders may gain additional fiefs because of service to the crown.

Table #ll is to be used with those who have connections with the royal court or leaders in the government.

Table #12 should be used only when the PC has developed a long-term, close relationship with the monarch or an important nobleman.

Finally, no examination of benefits would be complete without a list of misfortunes that accompany public life. Once a PC becomes well-known, there always will be adversaries, jealous rivals, meddlers, and gossips who try to bring him down. Table #13 catalogs the possible tribulations the DM can inflict on a PC who blunders, tries to cover up something in his past, or runs afoul of the wrong people.

DMs should take care to make these rewards an active part of the campaign. Court intrigue, favors owed, and reputations to be upheld have spawned many an adventure. As you read the lists below, consider what adventures could be built around each boon or benefit. These benefits also may be granted to entire adventuring parties where applicable.

Table #1 : Honors

- 1. Recognition or Mention: The PC's good deeds are acknowledged by a person of standing, or his name is printed in a bulletin or official publication. He gets a +1 reaction modifier for 1-3 months.
- 2. Honorary appointment/ degree: the PC is appointed to an honorary position, such as "High Provost of the Harvest Festival," or gets a "Doctor of Humane Philosophy" degree. He gets a +1 reaction modifier for 3-6 months.
- 3. Decoration/award: The PC receives a medal, trophy, ribbon, prize, testimonial, keys to the city, plaque, or certificate suitable for framing in an official ceremony. He gets a +1 reaction modifier for 6-12 months.

- 4. Membership in civic organization: The PC is inducted into something like the "Most Loyal and Worshipful Guild of Fishmongers." He becomes known as "pillar of the community," and will be on good terms with local leaders and officials, getting a permanent +2 reaction modifier when dealing with them.
- 5. Minor religious office: The PC is asked to serve in his temple as an usher, sacristan, secretary, bellringer, chorister, etc. (Priest-class PCs are appointed assistants to the high priest). This puts him in good standing with others of the same faith (automatic favorable reaction). The work does not take much time and there is no salary.
- 6. Arbitrator/Advisor: The locals respect the PC's opinion so much that he is asked to settle disputes. People often come to him for help and advice. This situation may lead to adventures.
- 7. Squireage: The PC is allowed to add the title "esquire" after his name and display his coat of arms. People tip their hats to him in the street. He's invited into the social life of the local gentry and is considered a militia and community leader. Note that this is different from the type of squire who is a knight's assistant. Essentially, an esquire is a junior member of the knightly class, a gentleman who's not been officially knighted.
- 8. Knighthood: The PC is knighted in a special ceremony. Knighthood gives the recipient many advantages, but requires service as well. The PC should observe the code of chivalry. Knights often are asked to slay monsters, right wrongs, vanquish evildoers, disperse bandits, rescue damsels, and so on, without asking for a reward, as it is unchivalrous to quibble about money.

Table #2: High Honors

- 1. Triumph/banquet/monument: The PC leads a triumphal parade, is esteemed at an impressive feast, or has a monument constructed in his honor. He gets a +2 reaction modifier for l-3 years.
- 2. Appointment to the royal house: The character receives an honorary job at court, such as "The Superintendent of the Royal Soup Spoon," with a yearly salary of 50-200 gold pieces (gp). He must present himself at court annually.

- 3. Elite decoration, honor, or epithet: The PC gets a fancy medal like "the grand cherub with triple oak leaf clusters." He can hobnob with other recipients of the decoration, and has a +1 reaction modifier for life. Alternatively, he is permitted to add an impressive style to his name such as "Sir Coroman Gramel, Crusher of the Hill Giants, Hero of Dimbar, and Drow-buster."
- 4. Name commemorated: A street, building, town, organization, or geographic feature is named after the PC. He doesn't get a reaction modifier, but everyone knows who he is, and he can smugly say, "That's my mountain."
- 5. Renowned hero: The PC becomes known far and wide for his exploits and gets a +2 reaction modifier for life, in addition to regular invitations for speaking engagements, parties, openings, etc.
- 6. Select knighthood: The character is admitted into an order of powerful and wealthy knights, like those described by Mike Easterday in DRAGON issue #125's "Code of Chivalry" or issue #195's "To All a Good Knight" by Tom Griffith. He must follow the rules of the order. The knights can help him hire followers, establish a freehold, meet important people, etc., but they also are involved in political intrigues and military ventures. Alternatively, the PC is made a banneret, a senior knight in charge of 5-20 other knights.

Table #3: Wealth

- 1. Gift: Jewelry, fancy clothes, expensive furniture, a work of art, a fine horse, ceremonial arms, etc., is given to the PC. If the stuff is sold, the giver will be insulted.
- 2. Cash grant: The amount (1,000-4,000 coins of appropriate denomination) should not be excessive.
- 3. Pension: A yearly stipend of 1,000-6,000 gp, as long as the ruler lives and the PC serves him. When a change of ruler takes place, the benefit lapses.
- 4. Benefice: This benefit usually is given to priests who have a supervisory responsibility in their church. The PC is given fiscal control over the extra revenue generated by a religious establishment. How the PC spends the money is up to him, but it will be noticed if it's not used for charitable purposes.
- 5. Property guardian: The PC becomes a trustee for a piece of property, whether a business, real estate, or valuable item. He may not sell the property, but any revenue it provides is his to keep.

6. Loan: A low- or no-interest loan of up to 20,000 gp is granted to the character.

Table #4: Real Estate

- 1. Rural land: Unimproved fields and meadows suitable for agricultural purposes are given to the character.
- 2. Country estate: Essentially a large farm with workers is granted to the PC.
- 3. Townhouse: The PC receives a good-sized ordinary building in a town.
- 4. Mansion: The PC receives a large, fancy house.
- 5. Tower: A small fortified building that can be located almost anywhere is given to the PC.
- 6. Palace: An opulent structure in a city, requiring some 300-600 gp per month upkeep is granted to the PC.

Table #5: Employment

- 1. Job: As a clerk, overseer, bailiff, guard, justice of the peace, tax collector, etc. It's part- to full-time. Pay is 5-20 gp per month.
- 2. Sinecure: A job requiring little or no work. Pay is 10-60 gp a month. The PC can hire a lackey to take care of everything.
- 3. Promotion: If the PC already has a job, he gets a promotion to management at double salary. If not, he gets a plum of a job that pays 75 gp per month and requires little or no work at all.
- 4. Minor government office: Such as a mayor, guild leader, village council member, etc. The work is parttime and the salary is 25-100 gp per month.
- 5. Junket: The government will pay the PC's expenses for one journey, during which time he is expected to do some nominal work.
- 6. Spy/Informer: The PC is asked to snoop, either while he's out adventuring or just around town. The amount he'll be paid is based on the information he ferrets out.

Table #6: Elite employment

1. Committee: The character is appointed to a royal committee which, for example, is investigating the snuff shortage or examining proposed regulations on the length of men's pointy shoes. The committee meets 1-4 times a year for 1-8 days at a time. For each meeting attended the character gets 10-100 gp.

- 2. Stewardship: The PC is placed in charge of a royal town, forest, or manor. the salary is 100-400 gp/month. The actual operation of the property can be left to someone else, but the PC will be held accountable for anything that happens.
- 3. Castellany/Constableship: The PC is placed in control of a castle and the surrounding lands. His salary starts at several hundred gp per month (DMs decide exact amount), plus whatever funds are allocated for upkeep and pay for the garrison. He may appoint a seneschal to manage the place in his stead, but he is ultimately responsible.
- 4. Envoy: An ambassadorship to a foreign land. Salary is 200-600 gp a month plus expenses. A train of servants and assistants are provided. Permanent embassies are rare; the work lasts 1-12 months.
- 5. Religious hierarchy: The PC gets a prestigious job in his church. Non-priestly characters can be appointed as church elders, advisors, or even to religious offices that don't require them to cast priest spells. Priests get special positions like supervising several small temples, assisting at a big cathedral, or serving a leader in the upper hierarchy. The work is part- to full-time and the salary ranges from none to substantial.
- 6. Business leader: A position on a guild council or company board of directors paying 50-300 gp/month. A few meetings must be attended each year.
- 7. Important office: Such as county sheriff, magistrate, governor, general, captain of the royal guard, etc. The job's full time and pays several hundred gp/month.
- 8. High office of the realm: Lord Marshal, Grand Constable, Royal Steward, Lord Chamberlain, Chancellor, High Justice, Warden of the Marches, etc. Salary is 1,000 gp month, but the job is full-time.

Table #7: Business

- 1. Business opportunity: The PC has a chance to "get in on the ground floor" of a new venture. He may invest up to 20,000 gold. Many businesses lose money in the first years. After that, typical profits are 1-20%.
- 2. Commission/Partnership: The PC gets a percentage or fee from a business. For example, an innkeeper might pay him for steering customers - to his inn. Alternatively, he can invest up to 10,000 gp as a "silent partner" in a company that's profitable.

- 3. Business holdings: Shares in a company. If it is profitable, the PC will receive yearly dividends of 1,000-4,000 gp. The shares also could be worthless, of course.
- 4. Share of ship: The PC gets cargo space on a merchant ship. He may rent out the space for 500-3,000 gp per voyage or invest up to 30,000 gp in merchandise to be traded. Profits on regular trips of 2-8 months are 5-40% with a small possibility of the ship being lost. Profits on voyages of 1-3 years can range up to several times the amount invested, but there is a good chance of the ship not returning.
- 5. Franchise/Merchant factor: A merchant group gives the PC the right to market their products or services in a particular area, as a semi-independent representative running his own business. The merchants provide know-how and materials at a discount. They are well-organized and their wares are in demand.
- 6. Subsidy: The PC gets a sum from the government to operate an enterprise that it deems essential, such as mail delivery or arms-making. This guarantees profits of 20% as long as the business is operated competently.
- 7. Monopoly: A highly lucrative benefit granted by the king. Profits from monopolies (such as salt, spices, or silk) start at 50%. If the PC abuses his monopoly he will become a despised figure among the common folk, as well as encouraging smuggling and a black market.
- 8. Hold fair: The PC has the right to hold an annual merchant fair and receives a small (1%) tax on all merchandise sold at the fair in addition to a fee (10-100 gp) for each vendor. The PC must make arrangements for a large open area for booths to be set up, provide police, judicial, sanitary, secure storage, accounting, water, food, and other needs. The profitability of the fair will depend on the merchandise, number of vendors and buyers, transportation net, weather conditions, etc.

Table #8: Titles

- 1. Baronet/Vavasour/Thane/
  Lord: Titles appropriate for the most minor of the nobility. Sometimes, there is no actual title at all, just a noble ranking.
- 2. Baron/Seigneur/Burgrave/Peer.

- 3. Count/Earl/Graf/Captal/Magnificio.
  - 4. Viscount.
- 5. Marquis/Margrave/ Landgrave/Palsgrave/Count Palatine.
- 6. Prince: The title of prince is granted to rulers of great lands in their own right, but is different from a royal prince (a close relation of the monarch).
  - 7. Duke
  - 8. Grand Duke/Grandee.

Table #9: Feudal fiefs

- 1. Manor: The smallest of feudal holdings, essentially a farm with workers. The manor house is nothing more than a larger-than-average building.
- 2. Village: A village of some l-400 peasants attached to a manor.
- 3. Knight's holding: A typical knight's allotment, with lands, a village, and castlet or fortified manor house.
- 4. Honour: A combination of several manors.
- 5. Lordship/Seignory: A large holding with a castle.
- 6. Freehold/Barony/Demense: The freehold as described in the DMG.
- 7. Regional holding: A large barony.
- 8. County/March/District/Forest: An extensive area composed of several baronies.
- 9. Town/Port: Population: 1,000-10,000.
- 10. Duchy/Province: An area composed of numerous baronies, counties, and towns.
  - 11. City: Population 10,000+.
- 12. Duchy or County Palatine: As #8 or #10 above, except that the PC holds the land in direct place of the sovereign, and has all the powers that the ruler would normally enjoy.

Table #10: Court benefits

- 1. License for castle or other stronghold: Permission to build a castle. This avoids the normal delays and fees. Most kings limit castle-construction to prevent individuals from becoming too powerful. Alternatively, a license is granted for some other enterprise.
- 2. Special privilege: The PC is given leave to do something that no one else can do, like wearing his hat at court, having armed bodyguards, or getting to hold the king's coat. These privileges are highly sought after and give the PC a +2 reaction modifier when dealing with courtiers.

- 3.Royal charter: The PC is granted a charter allowing him to carry out some specific deed for the benefit of himself and the crown; such as developing a freehold, founding a new town, opening up a trade route, or exploring new lands.
- 4. Tax exemption: The PC is released from paying certain taxes. This is usually done when the PC promises to invest his money for the benefit of the community. If he starts to acquire too much money, the DM always can impose "new" taxes not covered by the exemption.
- 5. Favorable legal judgement: If the PC is involved in a legal case, he gets a verdict in his favor.
- 6. Given command of troops: A military force, provided by the King, is placed under the PC's control. The King will provide pay and food for the men; the PC must provide living arrangements.
- 7. Arranged marriage: The PC has an advantageous marriage arranged, in that he can marry into a wealthy and powerful family. There is no guarantee the intended spouse will be young, attractive, or good-natured; arranged marriages are often the opposite.
- 8. Exchange/Ransom: If the PC is taken prisoner, the king will see to it that he is returned by paying the necessary price.
- 9. Hostage/Ward guardian: The PC is given charge of an important hostage or underage noble heir. The hostage must be treated with the utmost respect and allowed freedom within a certain area, but must not escape. The PC controls the ward's estates and fortune until he comes of age. There undoubtedly are other relatives of the heir who would benefit greatly if he died prematurely.
- 10. Patronage: An important person will back the PC by providing money, influence, equipment, followers, etc. He also will expect the PC to do his bidding whenever he desires. Alternatively, the PC may acquire a court-type NWP such etiquette, heraldry, dancing, musical instrument, animal handling (falconry), hunting, riding, singing, or artistry.

Table #11: Special benefits

- 1. Royal intervention: If possible, the king will bail the PC out of any trouble he's in, once and only once.
- 2. Alliance with noble family: A clan of aristocrats sees an opportunity in joining itself with the PC. While

- they can provide much help, they have their own interests in mind, and will treat the PC accordingly.
- 3. Court influence: The PC is welcome at court and can get small favors from courtiers and servitors without the usual waiting and bribery. In addition, each year the PC may propose one idea which will be considered by the king for action.
- 4. Adoption: The PC is adopted into a noble family (who may not have an heir) and receives all the benefits thereof, including titles, estates, servants, eccentric relatives, pressure to conform to family traditions, feud enemies, etc.
- 5. Royal pardon: The monarch pardons the PC for crimes he has committed.
- 6. Entrusted with secrets: The PC is taken into the monarch's confidence. The king won't be pleased if the information leaks or is used for the PC's personal advantage (see Disfavor, on Table #13 below). The benefit is double-edged, as enemies of the king may try to get the secrets from the PC in unpleasant ways.
- 7. The king's ear: The king will take suggestions from the PC. However, if the advice is bad, the PC will suffer the monarch's wrath (see Disfavor, below).
- 8. Royal favor: The PC can do no wrong in the king's eyes. This makes him an enemy of everyone opposed to the king, his policies, or who's just jealous. Royal favor is often capricious, and can be withdrawn as quickly as was is bestowed.

Table #12: Miscellaneous benefits

- 1. A pat on the back: Sometimes there are no tangible rewards for achievement.
- 2. Contacts: The PC acquires contacts for mostly reliable rumors and other information (a favorable modifier on die rolls for these types of encounters).
- 3. Popular acclaim: The PC is hailed by the commoners and earns their gratitude. He gets free meals, discounts on merchandise, and is generally well-liked by regular folks. The nobility, however, does not share in this admiration.
- 4. Introduction: The PC is introduced to an NPC of his choice. This is a good way to meet someone important without the usual red tape or bribes.
  - 5. Favor: A VIP owes the PC a one-

- time favor. The VIP will resent it if the PC asks for too much, but usually will keep his word. If the PC is greedy, word will get around and he won't get any more favors.
- 6. Transport: A horse, coach ride, ship passage, or even a magical steed or transport, is available for a one-time, one-way trip when the PC needs it. This can be more useful than it sounds. Remember "My kingdom for a horse"?
- 7. Letters of introduction: Official documents which introduce the bearer as a person of good character. Useful at nobles' castles and foreign courts.
- 8. Included in will: The PC stands to inherit money and property, but only while he stays in favor with the NPC who's making the will (usually a relative). He must wait for him to die, of course.
- 9. Good word: An influential NPC will put in a good word for the PC if needed. This may not solve the problem, but could help considerably.
- 10. Club: The PC becomes a member of an exclusive club. Influential people can be met there, where business and political deals are made. However, the club rules are strict and the PC will be ejected if he causes a disruption.
- 11. Education: A scholarship to an institution of higher learning. The PC (or a follower) can acquire an academic NWP such as history, languages, or religion.
- 12. Sponsorship/Apprentice-ship: An NPC will sponsor the PC in either proposing him for membership in some organization the PC wants to join, or by teaching him a craftsmen NWP such as blacksmithing, gem-cutting, or pottery in his spare time.
- 13. Religious initiate: The PC is initiated into a special religious group, generally a branch of his own faith. He becomes a lay member of the order (or if already a priest, becomes a member of an "inner circle"). Members of the sect will hold him in high regard. The DM might allow a nonpriest PC to learn a minor bit of priestly magic, or a priest PC to acquire a special spell.
- 14. Safe conduct pass: A guarantee of passage safely through areas of conflict. Evil persons often fail to recognize the validity of such documents.
- 15. Letter of marque: Permission to fit out an armed ship as a privateer, attacking enemy shipping during wartime. The king gets a cut of any loot, usually 25-50%.

- 16. Train of servants: A retinue of 4-16 well-trained grooms, butlers, maids, or coachmen, costing 20-80 gp per month. Room and board must be provided.
- 17. Secret society: The PC is admitted into a secret society which has a code of conduct, secret handshakes, funny hats, and so on. Some important people are also members. It costs 50-300 gp a year for dues and regalia and at least two meetings a year must be attended. Society members always help each other if possible. (Historical note: Santa Anna avoided a firing squad after being captured at the Battle of San Jacinto by flashing a secret Masonic distress sign, which was recognized by General Sam Houston, who also was a Mason.
- 18. Priestly or magical assistance/Mentor: The PC can call on a high-level priest or wizard for one-time help with spells or information. Alternatively, a mentor will teach him a NWP of the PC's choice.
- 19. Candidate for election: A political faction backs the PC as a candidate, by providing funds, campaign workers, and publicity. The PC may spend his own money as well. Whether he gets elected will depend on the PC's actions, but he will be beholden to his backers in any event. Most local-level elected positions are part-time jobs that pay 50-200 gp/month.
- 20. Refuge: A noble, a temple, or foreign ruler will provide political asylum and a hiding place for the PC if he gets in deep trouble.

Table #13: Misfortunes

- 1. Object of ridicule: The PC becomes a figure of fun to the locals. Any idea he proposes is met with riotous laughter. It is impossible for him to recruit NPCs.
- 2. Bad reputation: The PC acquires a bad name. Reaction rolls have a -2 penalty. Insulting rumors about him are constantly circulated. In addition, the gentry are offended, and no person of the noble class will have anything to do with him.
- 3. Mandatory host: At the King's command, the PC must play host to 2-8 arrogant nobles who make excessive demands for gourmet food, servants, entertainment, and so on. They stay 1-6 months and incur expenses of 100-400 gp/month each.
- 4. Required gift: The PC must provide a gift costing 1,000-6,000 gp to his overlord. If the overlord doesn't - like the gift enough, further gifts are demanded.

- 5. Demotion: The PC's job is downgraded; he even may be fired. If he is unemployed, he is conscripted into the king's service.
- 6. Legal disputes: The PC is sued by disgruntled followers, ex-lovers, and townspeople for real or imagined injuries. Alternatively, he is investigated by a government commission for violations of various obscure laws. The case will take 7-12 months to come to court and costs 1,000-6,000 gp in legal fees. If the PC loses, he can expect an additional penalty of at least the same amount.
- 7. Troops quartered: The PC has to board a group of rowdy soldiers. Their numbers will be appropriate to the size of the PC's abode, but will tend toward the maximum possible. The voracious troops each devour 10 gp of food and drink a month each, and will rudely annoy his family, followers, and friends, spy on the PC, and cause l-20 gp worth of breakage and pilfering every week.
- 8. Creditors: People who are owed money by the PC make intensive efforts to recover their money. This involves legal action and the hiring of collection agents and even thieves to acquire his valuables. If the PC doesn't owe any money the DM should arrange for him to be involved in a failing business venture that's deep in the red or inherit massive debts from a relative.
- 9. Forced loan: The PC must lend the King 1,000-10,000 gp (or more). There's a 40% chance the loan will be paid back in 2-24 months, a 25% chance for 2-5 years, a 20% chance for 6-11 years, and a 15% chance for never being paid back. The King rarely pays interest, either.
- 10. Forced duty: The PC is required to perform some unpleasant duty for the King, such as foreclosing on widows, collecting taxes from destitute elderly people, running orphans out of town, etc. This does nothing for his prestige.
- 11. Tax audit: The PC's tax payments up to seven years back are checked. If the PC has been scrupulous about paying taxes, there is a 40% chance of the auditor finding a minor problem that results in a 100-600 gp fine. If the PC has given normal attention to his tax payments, there's an 80% chance of a 1,000-6,000 gp fine. If he's been lax about paying his taxes, there will automatically be a 10,000-40,000 gp fine plus possible jail time.

- 12. Infamous: The PC becomes exceedingly notorious, and receives a -6 reaction modifier wherever he goes. Merchants close up shop, parents lock up their children, bureaucrats roll out the red tape, and town guardsmen harass him mercilessly. All his followers, except those of the worst character, desert.
- 13. Rivalry: The PC is challenged to a duel by a spiteful and powerful enemy. If he wins, his opponent will do everything in his power to cause him trouble the rest of his life. If he kills the enemy, he will be faced with an unending stream of challenges, assassination attempts, overt and covert attacks by the enemy's henchmen, friends, and relatives seeking revenge.
- 14. Unfavorable benefit: This appears to the PC to be one of the benefits listed in the charts above, but has something wrong with it. For example, the PC might get a haunted castle, or his land might turn out to be a stinking, monster-infested swamp, his gift might be cursed, his business venture a total failure, his new position subjects him to an endless stream of beggars, moochers, and cranks, or the favor of the king turns out to be that the monarch refuses to let the PC out of his sight and requires him to play parchesi 20 times a day.
- 15. Shotgun marriage: The PC is forced or tricked into marriage with a lying scoundrel or a whining shrew; the new in-laws are abominable, of course. They plot to gain his money and his possessions.
- 16. Feud: A hostile noble family enters a state of war with the PC. In the city, sudden attacks by family members can be expected. In the country, large bands of their armed retainers will be on the lookout for the PC. If he owns a fief, raids and full-scale assaults are possible.
- 17. Disfavor: the PC has displeased the king or queen. While he's not formally accused, he's next in line for the chopping block. Everyone avoids him. Any other PCs who associate with him suffer the effects of "bad reputation" (#2 above).
- 18. Dishonored/Disgraced: The PC is stripped of his titles, rank, and wealth in a formal ceremony, and becomes "infamous" (#12).
- 19. Exiled: The PC is forced out of the country, under penalty of death.
- 20. Outlawed: The character becomes a wanted criminal, with a bounty on his head.

A game campaign about simple survival

Background

The inspiration for this article begins in ancient history. In 401 B.C.; a Persian prince named Cyrus, brother of the King of Kings, Artaxerxes II, attempted to take over the whole Persian Empire from his brother. To enhance his military strength, he hired 13,000 Greek spearmen—some of the best mercenary troops going.

Cyrus was a skilled general, but this did not save him from the occupational hazard of all soldiers in war; he was killed in action at Cunaxa, near Babylon. His Greek troops mostly survived the battle, but were left leaderless in the heart of a hostile empire. To surrender would have meant slavery or worse for them, and when their officers tried to negotiate with the victors, they were treacherously taken prisoner.

However, the Greek soldiers found new leaders from amongst their numbers, including an officer named Xenophon, who had originally joined the expedition as an observer. The "Ten Thousand" then executed a brilliant fighting retreat on foot, over hundreds of miles of unknown country, some of it mountainous, in the face of local resistance during winter weather. They eventually found safety in the independent city-states of the Black Sea coast. Xenophon, who also was a writer and historian, told the story in a book called The Anabasis; not surprisingly, it fascinated Greeks of the time, as it showed a vast empire that could find no answer to determined Greek warriors. Later, Alexander the Great may have remembered this lesson when he led a Greek army

(Xenophon himself was a colorful character, an Athenian whose sympathies for Sparta, Athens' enemy, earned him exile from Athens for some years. He wrote books on military theory, politics, and on estate management; he was an intelligent, monarchistic, opinionated soldierthinker.)

Game relevance

Something very like the "March of the Ten Thousand," could be used as the basis for a limited role-playing campaign. Just have a bunch of PC heroes stranded deep in hostile territory, and offer them the simple choice: get back to friendly territory, or face slavery or death.

The PCs could be soldiers, mercenaries, or simply be on a quest or other mission that takes them into unfriendly territory. Apart from combat and wilderness survival problems, they could find themselves dealing with neutral locals, who might let them pass in exchange for favors or trade with them-provided that the PCs' pursuers could be distracted. Their route home might lead them through all sorts of mysterious country, perhaps taking in encounters with local creatures, weird NPCs, magical monsters, and strange sites in the wilderness. (This could be an excellent campaign to mix role-playing with table-top war-gaming; PC leaders and heroes have to deal with some problems personally, and also must direct the rest of the group when faced with the need to do battle.)

Obviously, it is possible to place PCs in such a situation on their own, and this can make for an interesting campaign, with the tiny PC group surrounded by thousands of enemies, having to think their way out of trouble. If the PCs are leading a large group though, they also must coordinate the group's movements, forage for food, and attempt to find shelter for the group. The group need not be an army; the PCs could be escorting a "wagon train" through hostile territory, guarding a merchant caravan, or protecting refugees. In such circumstances, the PCs also would need to protect the noncombatants. In any event, player characters tend to be pretty good at sneaking and dodging; they often can get through dangerous country by avoiding contact with the enemy. If they have to escort a large group with them though, they have to use different tactics and make harder decisions.

Making the idea fit

The main things that a game world needs to allow this campaign idea to work are a relatively large, strong nation or empire with some internal conflict or a powerful enemy state (which could be a nation or just an area heavily infested with monsters and dangerous creatures such as humanoids, fiends, dragons, giants, etc.) and some limitations with transport. It wouldn't do for the PCs simply to unroll their carpet of flying and soar home in a matter of hours. Magical modes of travel should be severely restricted or totally unavailable. (Obtaining such a means of transport could be one of the PCs' goals-so they don't have to walk all the way home.) One thing to bear in mind; the ruler

The other thing needed to make the campaign work is, of course, the right players with the right characters. They must be interested and willing to take on a tough mission in which the main objective is survival rather than glorious conquest; point out that "mere" survival against this sort of odds is glorious. Furthermore, the PCs must be committed to saving their entire force, including NPCs; if the players are too inclined to run selfserving, egocentric characters, they may decide to sneak away from the others one night, and use stealth to escape from the hostile territory while the NPCs get slaughtered. This can be discouraged by emphasizing that the best safety, in this situation, is in numbers, or by threatening the PCs with the revenge of any NPCs who survive such treachery. It is up to the GM to ensure that the PCs have the right attitudes. (Good-aligned characters should work to prevent any such PC defections if their players are good role-players anyway.)

Handling combat

When battles must be played out, note that some role-playing systems (such as the AD&D® game) have additional rules for mass combat (the BATTLESYSTEM® rules), some games such as the WARHAMMER* rules are closely tied up with dedicated war game systems, and some have been provided with simple, abstract systems for quickly handling such things. For SJG's GURPS* system, seek out the various supplements and magazines containing the official mass battle rules; for the FANTASY HERO* game, see the Fantasy Hero Companion. For this particular campaign idea, having use of a good set of table-top rules and the figures to use with them, is a very good idea; in fact, some groups may choose to regard this as a war game campaign with role-playing elements, rather than the reverse

Historical and fantasy settings

In an ancient-style fantasy setting, the story of The Anabasis can be recreated more or less in one piece, with as many extra, fantastic complications as the GM wishes. It even could be run as a complete, carefully researched recreation of the original events

(Also—GMs of time-travel campaigns could send PCs back to ancient Persia to observe the details of the original events. This could lead to adventures as the PC observers become entangled with the Ten Thousand's running battles. Alternatively, time meddlers could try to intervene at various points, perhaps to save Cyrus and give him the victory after all, perhaps to see the Greeks wiped out and The Anabasis never written—which could have all sorts of tricky, perhaps cataclysmic effects for subsequent Greek and Persian history.)

For a medieval fantasy campaign, imagine re-casting a stock low-level AD&D game party as junior members of a unit—line soldiers or guards (fighters), young wizards who tagged along with their mentor who was providing magical support and protection (mages), scouts (thieves), and chaplains and spiritual advisors (clerics). Now have these people elected to lead the survivors out of trouble when their high-level officers are captured or killed. They must pick an escape route and use their previously theoretical knowledge of strategy and planning in the face of all manner of opponents, monsters, and practical problems. Perhaps their pursuers can, by threatening or closing off one escape route but leaving another open, sucker the PCs' group into marching across "haunted ground," and the PCs must resolve the mystery of some enigmatic ruin before superstitious fear destroys the group's morale (a good excuse for a quick dungeonbash). Most important of all, the PCs have to keep the group together and in good spirits-which could be quite a role-playing challenge, given that the NPC members of the group may well be less competent or experienced than the PCs.

Modern settings

It's a bit harder to fit this idea in a modern-era game; the PCs have less to worry about if they can, for example, get hold of a transport plane to lift them out of their predicament and carry them home. (Even then, the dash for the airport can make an exciting scenario.) Even if an airlift isn't available, a few good trucks or armored personnel carriers can cross most modern nations in a few days (which could make for a Road Warrior style "running fight" scenario.) However, that's assuming that the stranded PCs can get hold of reliable transport of one sort or another.

A group of superheroes or spies could be trapped with a group of important NPCs (aliens, defectors, etc.) they intended to rescue. An infantry squad, caught deep in enemy territory, can have a hard trek on their hands, with many potential incidents along the way. GDW built all their early TWILIGHT 2000* game scenarios around this basic idea.

SF games

A high-tech SF game can open up the whole question again—not because transport is necessarily slow or unavailable, but because distances to cover can be so much greater. One possibility is to have the PCs stuck on a fairly low-tech planet, with little transport; perhaps the planet has a single starport, considered "neutral ground" under strict interstellar law—but that's thousands of miles away. (This idea has been used in some scenarios for GDW's TRAVELLER* RPG before now.)

Alternatively, the PCs already may be aboard a ship—but the enemy territory around them consists of hundreds of star systems, and the Enemy has a strong navy. (See Return of the Jedi for relevant ideas.) Or, the mechanism that allows starships to cover the vast interstellar distances (jump drive, warp-speed engines, etc.) is damaged beyond the PCs' ability to repair while the vessel and its occupants are deep inside enemy space.

Afterword

If the "Anabasis campaign" is set up as a short-term, "closed" campaign, then it ends when the PCs and their (surviving) followers reach safety—friendly or neutral territory—and go home to write their memoirs. However, the same plot could be inserted into an open-ended campaign, at the beginning or somewhere in the middle. If this is done, the PCs will gain more from the ordeal than the usual experience points and plunder.

For one thing, they will probably be remembered, respected, and admired by the people they led to safety. Having the friendship of a large band of NPCs is nothing to complain about in any RPG. This doesn't mean that these NPCs will follow the PCs blindly and unpaid into further dangers, but occasional requests for assistance will be looked on favorably, and the odd offer of interesting work, with payment deferred, might be treated with more respect than usual.

Secondly, following the story of the original Anabasis, the PCs can become famous. Aside from the chance to obtain free drinks at inns by recounting the tale to appreciative audiences, they may be pursued by people who want to know more about the practical details of their success. The PCs have proven that they can defeat the enemy's armed forces, secret police, wizards, psionicists, etc., despite desperate odds; their tactical ideas could be worth borrowing.

Of course, this cuts two ways; the enemy they escaped from may regard them as an embarrassment, a target for revenge, and a danger for their knowledge of the enemy's weaknesses. A few run-ins with summoned monsters or hired assassins should keep the PCs on their toes.

This in turn might encourage the characters to take an interest in a logical follow-up adventure. Seven decades passed between Xenophon's expedition and Alexander's conquest of Persia, but a game world could see something similar happen much quicker; an invasion of the enemy by a rising power (perhaps one the PCs can be convinced to support with promises of riches, land grants, etc.). In that case, the PCs would be in line for employment as military advisers, intelligence experts, and perhaps, even generals.

Sources

The story of The Anabasis is mentioned in most history books that deal with the ancient Greek period, and Xenophon's own book, The Anabasis, has been translated more than once. GMs wanting to research the historical events in detail should be able to find something in any good-sized public or university library; casual readers might well find enough in a decent encyclopedia.

Two GMs equals half the work and twice the fun

The adage that serves as this article's title, while not true in all cases, certainly applies to the fine art of being a game master (GM). The GM must not only prepare the adventure, but also must keep track of the characters' actions, look up rules, play the diverse roles of every NPC encountered, and still make sure the players are having fun! Being a GM definitely is a labor of love, but sometimes the workload can become too much for one person. There are times when a second GM can be a lifesaver.

Benefits

Have you ever wondered why so many novels are created by writing partners? It is because two minds working together more than doubles the output of creativity. Working alone, a GM (or author) may have a limited perspective on how characters may react to certain challenges and may not realize the full spectrum of possibilities. Partners can toss ideas back and forth to decide which are the best and put them to use. New traps and puzzles can be tested on one's partner to discover whether they are actually as challenging as thought. Partners also can discover weak areas or mistakes in the adventure (or story) that otherwise could go unnoticed.

Split parties often are a headache for a GM. Fret no more! With a little coordination, a separated group can be run easily by two GMs. As long as the two GMs keep each other informed of the characters' actions, all will go well without one GM having to run back and forth between player groups. Combat scenarios also can move along much faster with two GMs. Each one can work with a smaller group of players, so no one has to sit bored while waiting for her turn to roll the dice. The post-battle excitement level also is raised as each player enthusiastically describes the action from his character's perspective to players in the other group.

What happens when the GM cannot make it to the game session? Normally, the game is cancelled or someone else has to prepare a quickie fill-in adventure. Not if there are two GMs.

For example, Rob remembers that he has a big term paper due Monday and doesn't have time for tonight's game. He calls his GM partner, Gina. Gina and Rob talk for a few minutes about the adventure they had prepared, then Gina takes their notes and goes to the game. After Rob has finished his paper, he visits Gina to get caught up on the game's events and they begin to work on the next week's adventure.

GMs can work together in different ways. For convenience, I have divided the type of GM partnerships into three categories: Co-GMs, Assistant GMs, and Apprentice GMs. In actual play, the functions and roles of these different types cross over and the boundaries can blur.

GMs take equal roles. All responsibilities are divided equally and neither partner takes precedence over the other. This can be the most difficult form of GM partnership, especially if both people are headstrong individuals. The partners should be good friends who work well together. They also should spend plenty of time together. The best pairs of Co-GMs might be either roommates or spouses. The toughest part of being a Co-GM is alternating who actually runs the game during that particular game session and who takes a lesser role. One way to do this is through "tag teaming," in which the GMs alternate running the game several times during one session. However, this can be confusing to the players as well as the GMs! A better method may be to let one GM give descriptions and do the various dicerolling, while the other plays essential NPCs and looks up rules questions. Co-GMs can create wonderful situations, such as letting the player characters resolve an argument between two

NPCs, each played by one of the GMs.

Assistant GMs

Although he usually has as much responsibility as a Co-GM, the Assistant GM tends to take a back seat during actual play. While not running the game, the assistant still has plenty of responsibilities to keep him busy. If a question about one of the rules arises during play, the game does not have to come to a halt while the GM searches through her notes and books for the answer. Instead, the Assistant GM can look up the rule in question while the action continues. Rules lawyers often relish this role, as it gives them a chance to show off their expertise. Another task for the Assistant GM is the control of "special effects." He can create fun sound effects and pop an appropriate soundtrack into the stereo when the real action starts. Thus the GM/DJ is born! An Assistant GM also should be given the chance to play NPCs, guide split parties, and run the game when the regular GM cannot make it. Remember, it is still a partner-ship! The assistant is an equal in most ways, especially during the game's creation. One of the most helpful things an Assistant GM can do during a game is to take notes on the adventure, both for posterity and for creating future adventures.

Apprentice GMs

Sometimes a player will decide that she would rather run a game than play a character but feels that she is not quite ready to run a game on her own. Maybe she is a new player that does not yet know all of the essential rules, or perhaps she just lacks selfconfidence. Either way, the best way to prepare for a career as a solo GM might be to work with someone who is more experienced and comfortable with the role. The "apprentice" works with the experienced GM in much the same way as an assistant would, but with an emphasis on learning and working toward full mastery of the role. The GM should take the time to answer any questions from the apprentice during the game or creation of an adventure. The GM also should seek as much input from the apprentice as possible and let her look up rules, even if they are already known. These drills will help to boost the apprentice's confidence, as will letting her run short side-bar adventures. It is imperative that a GM remembers that his partner is an apprentice in name only. She is not someone to sweep the floor or fetch popcorn for the gaming group! Treatment like that can quickly lose you a friend. The apprentice is in no way inferior to the regular GM, simply less experienced.

Problems

GM partnerships can add much variety and excitement to your game, but there are a few things to be careful about. As in all relationships, conflicts can arise between the two GMs. These disagreements can be caused by details as minor as an NPC's name or something as important as the campaign's continuing theme. The most logical way to resolve a conflict is through compromise. However, diplomacy does not always work. If the argument comes to a point at which it disrupts the game or threatens a friendship, it should be taken care of immediately. Either get both parties to drop the issue, or go back to using a single GM. If a GM partnership doesn't work for your group, then don't use it. It's as simple as that.

Also to be avoided is the use of more than two GMs. Remember, too many cooks can spoil the soup. If your gaming group is so big that you feel you need more than two GMs, it would probably be better to split the group into different campaigns. The games can still cross-over with each other, and things should be much less confused. A second GM probably is not a good idea unless a group has more than five players. It can still be a benefit, but there is no real need for one. Besides, who wants more GMs than players?

A partnership between two GMs can be a very rewarding experience, both for players and GMs. It is surprising just how much more can be accomplished and how much is added to the game. So try a GM partnership in your campaign and I think that you will agree that two heads really are better than one.

Dungeon Masters often are frustrated by experienced AD&D® game players. Such players have a decade or more of experience with the AD&D game, and in that time they have perfected drills for dealing with nearly every trap, magical item, and band of low-level monsters imaginable. Given this, DMs must be willing to break with traditions to keep their adventures and campaigns novel and interesting. This article discusses breaking with one very prevalent tradition, that of party composition. Specifically, this is an article about designing and running adventures or campaigns for parties whose members are all of the same class.

The most effective class "mix" for an adventuring party is about 40% warriors, 30% priests, 20% wizards, and 10% rogues. This combination stresses combat effectiveness and character durability (both in hit points and in availability of healing spells), while at the same time represents all of the classes so that the skills of each are available should they be needed. This also is the combination that is assumed by most game modules, and the combination that groups of players, in general, are most used to playing. The party of uniform class therefore represents a profound naries or crusaders who have adventured together several times in the past; true, spell-casters and lockpickers may be useful at times, the fighters' thinking might go, but these types have to be protected in combat, and our opponents are just too dangerous to allow time for babysitting. Note that a party of rangers could be "free agents" of the sort mentioned above.

In general, a party of warriors will be more combat effective than a mixed party of the same number and level. However, the difficulty level of the monsters should not be increased in accordance with this. The reason for this is that every battle, even the ones that the heroes are relatively certain to win, will cause injury to members of the party. Like a party of wizards or rogues, a party of warriors can recover lost hit points only through the nonweapon proficiency Healing, which is usable once per day on each character, or through some means of temporarily foregoing the adventure, either by resting or by returning to town to receive the attention of an NPC priest. Unlike wizards and rogues, however, warriors have no readily available skills or abilities that allow them to avoid combat. For a party of warriors, often the only way to get past a monster is to defeat it.

This is not to say that warriors should not be encouraged to use strategy or clever deception in fighting monsters, but the cumulative effects of damage inflicted balance any increase in fighting ability over the course of many direct-combat encounters. An exception to this might be made for paladins, whose "laying on hands" and the ability to purchase the Healing proficiency at normal cost combine to give them a slight edge in recuperative ability. The monsters faced by a band of paladins probably should be a little tougher, but bands of fighters or rangers should be forced to battle only extremely challenging monsters when the encounter is soon to be followed by an opportunity to recover.

Scenario: The prince

The distraught queen of a small and peaceable kingdom has declared war on a tribe of hobgoblins living in the wilderness to the north because she recently learned that these hobgoblins have captured her only son. This dire news was reported to the queen by members of the prince's retinue who were left for dead by the hobgoblins after their ambush. These men also say that the hobgoblins did not seem to recognize the prince as a member of royalty; he was shackled and led away like the rest of the retinue and will probably be kept alive only until he ceases to be useful as slave labor.

The player characters either are members of the kingdom's standing army, or independent warriors who have volunteered to help the army in this mission. Either way, they are friends of the prince and know him to be a just and worthy leader who deserves a better fate than to be the prisoner of hobgoblins.

The hobgoblin base is a ruined keep sandwiched between two obstacles: a dense, labyrinthine, and evilly enchanted forest to the west, and a dangerous mountain range to the east. Only two long, narrow passes between these obstacles, one to the north and one to the south, allow access to the keep. The queen's army has split in two and engaged the hobgoblins simultaneously in both passes, thus preventing the hobgoblin leaders from taking their slaves and fleeing the region. Unfortunately, both the organization and the ferocity of the hobgoblin resistance has exceeded all expectations. The prognosis of the commander of the kingdom's forces is not good; neither half of the army is gaining any ground, and at present rates the dwindling supplies and mounting casualties will necessitate a full retreat in seven more days. The commander shares this information with the player characters because he has a mission for which he wants them to volunteer. While the army keeps the hobgoblin warriors occupied, the player characters are to make a covert assault on the hobgoblin base to locate and rescue the prince. Since the mountain range is unpassable for travelers in metal armor, the characters will approach the base by way of the forest, where the principal danger is the evil monsters who lurk within it. If the player characters are fighters, they were chosen because they have experience with this sort of heroic mission. If they are paladins or rangers they were chosen because their protection from evil or woodland skills respectively will serve them well in the forest. The party will be completely cut off from the army while it is "behind enemy lines," but the commander does have two potions of healing he will give the group. He will advise the characters to use them sparingly.

If the party successfully overcomes the monsters it meets in the forest, then it will reach the hobgoblin keep in two days. Allowing one day to find and liberate the prince and two days for the return trip leaves the party two days to hide in the brush just inside the forest and recover.

The ruined keep will be mostly devoid of adult males when the party arrives, except for those who are recuperating in the crude infirmary. Careful examination of the keep from within the forest will allow the characters to notice that the few remaining uninjured adult males seem to be regularly visiting the keep's sole tower, exactly as if they are guards rotating shifts-this must be where the slaves are kept. Elves in the party also may spot a secret door in the wall of the keep that allows access to the tower without having to pass through the infirmary, so that the party may attempt to dispose of the guards quickly, before they can sound an alarm. Unfortunately for the party, the hobgoblin leader has stayed behind, and he will happen upon the party before it can escape. The party will then have to defeat him, or else the heroes will wind up as slaves themselves-slaves who will certainly be better guarded in the future.

Wizards

In contrast to warriors, wizards are the most difficult characters around whom to design a one-class adventure. Unless they are lucky enough to own an offensive magical item or two, wizards derive all of their combat effectiveness from spells, and these spells are quickly depleted. Even the offensive magical items generally possess a finite number of charges. It is because wizards must so conserve their energies that they deliberately travel with bands of warriors and priests who can do their fighting for them; this allows wizards to use their few spells for less wasteful pursuits. A party of unaccompanied wizards therefore would be rare indeed, and could be the result only of unusual circumstances.

The most important thing the DM should remember in designing an adventure for a party of wizards is that this class derives all of its power from rest periods. For warriors, rest periods are necessary only for recovering hit points. For wizards, however, they assume the added significance of being the only means by which they can "restock" the magical arsenal on which they are so dependent. Therefore, an all-wizards adventure should be structured so that opportunities to rest and study spells are regularly available. The number of encounters in one adventuring day should be kept small enough so that a party that intelligently budgets its spells will have a spell or two remaining to use against the last monster. While it may be amusing to have the party run out of spells and be forced to engage a monster in melee, such an attack probably is doomed to failure unless the opponent is very weak. The DM should run a practice battle involving spell-less wizards to gain a realistic idea of how meager their fighting abilities are.

Beyond this, the abilities of the party may vary widely, according to what spells are written in the party spell books, The adventure should be tailored to reflect these abilities, and the monsters should be weak enough to reflect the lack of warriors. However, at least a few of the encounter areas should be challenging enough that the wizards are forced to use their spells in untraditional ways, or in imaginative combinations to which they would never have resorted had there been warriors and priests available to protect them.

Scenario: The spell book

A desperate messenger has brought terrible and unexpected news to the city. Two dozen miles away, the war that has raged for the past year has been utterly lost; the invaders are marching in victory toward the city, and will arrive within the day. One of the many treasures the invaders hope to find within the city is the Spell Book of Tross, the private tome of a deceased archmage containing powerful spells of his own invention. The invaders wish to find it so they can deliver it to the mage who leads them and thereby increase his power.

The player characters are wizards, either mages or specialists. They are the graduate students, instructors, or temporary guests of the city's College of Magic who, for one reason or another, have neither joined the warriors, priests, and able-bodied men in battling the invaders, nor attempted to bribe their way across the enemy lines like the city's thieves' guilds. They recognize that the Spell Book of Tross could be a tool for great evil and destruction if it fell into the invaders' hands, so they have retrieved it from the college's library, and now it falls to them to smuggle the book to safety. Fortunately, there is a way to do this, but it will be very dangerous.

The college has long known of ancient catacombs deep beneath the city, catacombs that are connected to a series of natural caverns that extend far outside of town. Unfortunately, the catacombs are inhabited, both by undead and by a handful of creatures who have migrated from the caverns. The caverns have not been mapped, but it is believed that they exit near a stretch of rocky hills outside of town. A journey through these hills will be slow and quite difficult, but it is unlikely that the invaders will choose to patrol here. Beyond the hills is a 100mile trek through largely uncleared wilderness to the keep of the nearest good-aligned lord who can be trusted to provide sanctuary to the characters and the spell book. The characters know the location of the secret entrance to the catacombs. Therefore, if they leave quickly, they can begin their run for safety without the invaders knowing where they have gone. The characters may be able to learn some of the spells in the book they are carrying, but most will be too high-level for their comprehension.

This adventure will be a long one, but it is composed of several short episodes, and there is no time limit (as long as the invaders do not discover them and give pursuit), so the party can take as many rest periods as their provisions allow. If the party clears the catacombs, it can rest safely before entering the caverns. If it clears the caverns, it can rest safely before emerging into the hills. From there, the party can expect a significantly lower frequency of encounters, say 0-3 per day at the very most. These wilderness encounters will be much more challenging than the underground encounters-some even may require the characters to cast nearly all of their spells to defend themselves. However, the party always has the option of seeking out a natural hiding place and waiting quietly for the chance to memorize more spells before traveling any farther.

Priests

A party of priests is the one-class party that suffers the least for the lack of the other classes. The combat ability of priests is second only to that of warriors, and priests have several spells available that approximate the spells of wizards and the skills of rogues. For this reason, priests merit the least commentary.

It is worth noting, however, that a party of priests, particularly clerics, easily is the most resilient of the possible one-class parties, and this is due of course to the large number of healing spells that the party has available. At higher levels, the difference in fighting ability between warriors and priests is significant, but at lower levels this difference is small enough that the healing ability of a party of priests makes them at least competitive with their warrior counterparts. In populating a dungeon for a party of priests, the DM need not be overly conservative.

The principal challenge for the DM will be in justifying both the association of a large group of priests, and the fact that they must embark on a dangerous adventure without the assistance of any warriors or wizards. If the priests all worship the same deity, this may be easy enough to do. However, the adventure stands to be much more interesting if the priests serve different deities.

Scenario: The temple

There is a large and fairly wealthy temple that has long been thought to be the ideal location for the uninterrupted worship of a certain goodaligned goddess. However, for the past several months, a sinister band of fiend worshipers has been secretly carving out their own temple beneath that of the goddess. Two days ago, the fiend worshipers penetrated the goddess' temple from below, and drove out all of its clerics, Now they have corrupted the temple with their evil, and it is believed that they are engaged in unearthly rituals aimed at opening a permanent gate to the Lower Planes.

The aura of evil about the temple is so strong that any non-evil being who attempts to enter it becomes so racked with pain as to be unable to continue. Protection from evil spells are useless to combat this effect. It is felt that perhaps a paladin would be able to withstand the aura sufficiently to enter and retake the temple; paladins therefore have been summoned, but the closest ones are six days' ride away. It was one of the temple's displaced residents who discovered the defense: a good-aligned cleric wearing a silver holy symbol around his neck can enter the temple unharmed. It was decided, therefore, that since the fiend worshipers have to be dealt with immediately, there is no time to wait for the paladins. The player characters are the good-aligned clerics who have been assembled to foil the fiend worshipers and take back the temple if possible. Some of the characters are former residents of the temple, but most are clerics who worship good deities who are allies of the goddess of this temple.

The party will find the temple infested with chaotic evil allies of the fiend worshipers, some of them undead, most of them living (else the party might have it too easy-they could just turn undead through the entire adventure). Resistance will be fierce, but because of the chaotic nature of the enemy it will be disorganized. Former residents of the temple may know the location of hidden clerical scrolls, or similar useful items. If the party is able to find these items, they may come in handy against the fiend worshipers. If the fiend worshipers have found these items, however, then the evil priests will use them against the party in the final battle.

Note: If the temple is replaced with a sacred forest, then this becomes a scenario for a band of druids.

Rogues

Since it is difficult to imagine an adventuring party consisting solely of bards, this will be a discussion of oneclass adventures for thieves (perhaps with a bard or two tagging along).

The most obvious justification for a party of thieves is a thieves' guild of which all the characters are active members. Such organizations are understandably secretive, and an adventure involving only thieves could simple be "guild business" that need not involve outsiders. Unfortunately, such an adventure could be difficult for the DM to design; in all likelihood the adventure would take place within an urban environment, and if this urban environment is the city that is home base to the guild, then the characters logically would be quite familiar with it, and the DM would have to impart a great deal of information before the adventure began.

Indeed, where all-wizard adventures are the most difficult to justify, all-rogue adventures are the most difficult to create. Thieves surpass only wizards in combat ability (except for that very handy ability to backstab unknowing foes), but unlike wizards, thieves in general are not able to use magic to make up for this shortcoming. The typical AD&D game adventure that relies heavily on direct combat is probably least appropriate for thieves, because thieves have no special talents that are applicable to this situation (and backstabbing one's way through an entire adventure quickly would grow tiring). An allthief adventure probably would have to be an urban adventure requiring stealth and guile, or a dungeon adventure relying on mechanical traps more heavily than monsters (such as a tomb or crypt).

Scenario: The city

For over a decade, the city has had only one resident thieves' guild, and this is the guild to which the player characters belong. The guild is neutral in alignment, and its longevity is due in part to a secret agreement it has with the city guard: in exchange for restricting its burglaries to businessmen who are known to be corrupt, the city guard makes only a haphazard attempt to arrest the burglars who are guildsmen. Recently however, a large, evil thieves' guild has come to the city and is attempting to take the city for its own. Assassination is the means by which they hope to accomplish this; in the past four nights, four of the player characters' fellow guildsmen have been ambushed and slainsomething must be done at once. Unfortunately, appeals to the city guard have been largely ignored; while the agreement between the two organizations has been helpful in the past, the guard will not shed blood for thieves. The guild is on its own.

What is known about the evil guild is that its base is a bunker outside of town. The base is well-fortified, and the entrance is laden with intricate traps. Leadership in the evil guild is achieved through the assassination of existing leaders; the present leader is a high-level chaotic evil human thief who has managed to remain in power for five months now. The mission of the player characters, therefore, is to end the threat to their own guild in the most straightforward way possible, by infiltrating the evil guild's base, killing the leader, and assuming control. Of course, this is somewhat easier said than done.

The DM should remember that the opponents in this scenario are a band of thieves, probably chaotic ones at that, not a well-organized militia. This is what will give the player characters the edge they need. Since all of the guild members consider themselves above sentry duty, for example, hired men-at-arms will be keeping watch. These will be somewhat alert, but all in all fairly easily disposed of, hopefully before they can sound an alarm. It is the trapped entrance corridors that the guild most relies on for security, and these should give the party some trouble (negative modifiers on the PCs' skills for particularly intricate traps is possible). Once inside, the party will be confronted with a large chamber wherein most of the lowerranking guild members will be drinking and loudly carrying on. This crowd is drunk enough that the party should be able to contrive some means of sneaking through without attracting undue attention. Beyond this chamber, however, the party will encounter the guild officers, and these will be much more wary. The party even may have to resort to bargaining with one of these officers, offering to help the officer kill the guild leader if the officer can lead them to him. If such a bargain is struck and the guild leader is engaged in battle, then when the leader is weakened the player characters may have to defend him against the officer so that the officer does not strike the killing blow. If they do not, then they must attempt to kill the new leader immediately after he has killed the old one. Either way, this will make for a confusing battle, but mercurial loyalties are to be expected. After all, there is no honor among thieves.

Conclusion

Of course, the preceding analysis was brief. This article was intended to be illustrative as much as instructional, to show how far beyond the traditional AD&D game norms it is possible to go while still playing the game enjoyably. For this reason it was deliberately extreme; a mixed party of clerics and druids would not go against the spirit of this article, nor would a party of fighters, paladins, and rangers. Nor, for that matter, would a party of thieves that included multi-classed members who also were warriors, priests, and wizards. When it comes to deciding what sorts of parties can find adventure in an AD&D campaign world, the rules are exactly as accommodating as the DM who uses them.

Magical-item tables for the ENCYCLOPEDIA MAGICA<sup>TM</sup>

tomes

Those of you who've seen the new ENCYCLOPEDIA MAGICA books know from a glance that each of its volumes contain thousands of magical items. These items are culled from every issue of DRAGON®, DUNGEON®, Imagine, and The Strategic Review Magazines, each issue of the POLYHEDRON® Newszine, and from every module, accessory rule book, boxed set, and flipbook produced by TSR from 1974 through the end of 1993. This is approximately 1,600 pages worth of stuff in a compacted, yet readable type size.

Volume IV, released to distributors in November, 1995, contains two very important appendices. The first is an extensive index for those looking for a specific item but can remember only part of its name or an item created by a specific individual. (Originally, the index was going to cover magical effects as well, but the index, then, would be a volume in itself, and that wasn't an option.)

The second and probably the most important appendix in Volume IV is the Random Determination Matrices. It's unfortunate that the tables-the all-important link between the volumes and the DM divvying the magic out-couldn't be included in the first volume

Because the random tables are in Volume IV, players and DMs alike must wait until December, 1995, before the volumes can used to their fullest capacity. In order to alleviate this problem, we are giving you, the reader of DRAGON Magazine, the unique privilege of seeing a prepress edition of the random tables.

The prepress release of these tables are timed with the release of the third volume in the series. They weren't given before this time because about half of the items listed in the tables were yet undefined. Now with the release of Volume III, most of the items are detailed and are readily available for the DM. Anything rolled that's yet to be described either can be invented for the time being or simply rerolled.

When possible, the DM should select the magical items to be given out in the campaign. Sometimes, however, the DM has more pressing matters to worry about, and a series of magical item randomizing charts can help tremendously, especially with the hundreds of thousands of magical variations (including both weapons and miscellaneous gear) listed in the pages of the four volumes of the series. To select magical items randomly, roll on Table 1 below. This table directs the DM to the specific categories listed in Tables A through T. Table 1 is almost identical to Table 88 in the DMG, except that it includes an entry for humorous items and one for artifacts and relics. Please note, however, that Table T, the table containing the complete list of artifacts, does not have an entry on Table 1. This is due to their unique nature and power. Artifacts should never be given out randomly as treasure. Table T, though, is included in order to give the DM a list of the artifacts available in the ENCYCLOPEDIA MAGICA volumes.

The die rolls for these tables are d1000. This means the DM must roll three lo-sided dice, coming up with a number from 001 (one) to 000 (1,000). It is suggested that the DM use three different colored dice to make the rolling easier. For instance, if a red, white, and a blue die are used, the DM would use the red for the hundreds place, the white for the tens digit, and the blue die for the ones.

Several items listed on the tables have an asterisk after the name. If this result is rolled, the DM is encouraged to roll again on that table, combining the entries into a unique item. This can be done any number of times, but the DM may wish to limit the number of rerolls to, say, three.

Dee: Welcome back! We'd like to thank you for joining us again, and we encourage you to write with your comments on our reviews, or with suggestions for games for us to look at, as John Brock and Pete Cobb have recently done.

Jay: Let's start off this month by sharing the letter from John, which was all about Space Hulk and our review thereof.

Dee: John liked the game a lot, and wanted us to make sure that we were giving it its due. He writes: "I like the way you folks present your column. However, I felt that your review of Space Hulk...did not do the game justice, and I think it may be because you didn't realize some things about the game. Of course, I know about these things because I did like the game, played it for hours on end, and am still playing it months after I bought it. (I've gone through the entire campaign game at least twice.)"

Jay: That's a ringing endorsement right there, and should be enough for you borderline cases and fans of the board game to ignore us completely.

Dee: John goes on to say: "The key point you seemed not to understand is that you are your squad's command points, and these command points can be used only in monitor view . . . when their weapons jam, the odds of successfully unjamming are much higher when you are personally supervising that squad. . . .

Jay: If you'll remember, one of our complaints was that the board game mechanics were not recreated to our liking, and that it was impossible to get our squads to do anything meaningful in runtime view.

Jay & Dee's	ratings at a	glance
Game	Jay	Dee
SimTower	3 1/2	3
D!Zone	1	1 ½
Heretic	2	3/5
Landstalker	3	4

Dee: John says: "If your trigger finger is used to the arcade routine, you are capable of firing much faster than your men are . . . This means that any time you have someone who is in a tight situation, if you're not in monitor view in his body, frantically pulling the trigger, he's probably a dead man. If you are there, the hall is going to have a lot of genestealer corpses—if you don't screw up!"

Jay: Well, that's pretty much what we said; I think we're in violent agreement about how the game works, we just diverge in our ability to pile up genestealer corpses—and to enjoy piling them. If that sort of thing floats your boat, then fine. It didn't do much for me, and I found it frustrating that my trigger finger wasn't up to snuff.

Dee: Here's John's kicker argument: "This is why the game is one of the most tense I have ever played: to win the more interesting scenarios, monitor view in real time is a must—but it requires perfect, lightning-quick reactions, and while you're there, you can't keep track of what's going on around you. Freeze time is needed as much to give yourself a chance to breathe (and massage the cramps out of your firing hand!) as to give orders." He goes on to explain how he wins even the toughest of scenarios. He also mentions that sound (which we were forced to play without due to an incompatibility problem) is essential to good play.

Jay: We stand by our review with one caveat: if you're a fast-action player who loves Doom, say, and you're looking for Doom with multiple squad member viewpoints and a little more strategy... you might try checking out Space Hulk.

Dee: But remember: it was John who sent you, not us.

Jay: And many thanks to John for his fervent yet polite letter. We don't mind if people disagree with us, so if you have comments of your own on any of the games we review, please write to us in care of DRAGON Magazine. And thanks to Pete Cobb as well, who brought a particular game to our attention that he feels is worthy of review. Feel free to do the same! [Editor's note: Also see Lester Smith's "Eye of the Monitor" guest review of Space Hulk in DRAGON® issue #214 for a viewpoint much like John's.

Dee: Now to our regularly scheduled program. This month's feature reviews include SimTower from Maxis Software, D!Zone, published by WizardWorks, and Heretic, created by Raven Software and published by id Software. So as not to have our Sega Genesis users feel too let down, we'll also talk about Landstalker from Climax.

Simtower (Maxis)

Reviews

SimTower

for Macintosh

Maxis

Requires: 68030 or higher, color monitor, 8-bit (256 color) graphics, 4MB RAM, hard drive, System 7.0 or higher

Jay: Now, this is the kind of thing that captures my attention: no guns, blood, rapid firing or death anywhere.

Dee: Certainly Maxis is known for its Sim line, which hardly ever includes decapitation and death—except, of course, for SimAnt.

Jay: Which, if I remember correctly, you weren't very fond of.

Dee: That's right. Maxis calls all their products "computer toys" or "recreational software," and not games. They feel, I suppose, that the gameplay is not up to snuff and that it's the tinkering that's the fun part of their products.

Jay: But "not up to snuff" is a loaded phrase. There is no gameplay because there is no game. You can gain both recreation and enjoyment from the tools they give you and the results you can achieve. Criticizing SimTower's gameplay for being "not up to snuff" is like saying that the gameplay of a G.I. Joe doll is lacking because he just lies there.

Dee: Okay, so we're reviewing it that way. Resolved: SimTower is a toy that you play with in the same way you play with Barbie or G.I. Joe.

Jay: Considering it as a toy, I enjoyed SimTower You start with a simple toolbar and an empty stretch of world with a faux city background. Your toolbar lets you build lobby, office, condominium, fast food, elevator and stair units. That's it.

Dee: Seems kind of limited, and it is—this toolbar is for "one-star" towers only.

As you graduate in star ratings, more tools become available to you For example, at two stars you can build hotel rooms and service elevators.

Jay: The changing complexity makes it feel like a game: trying to earn the next star rating is a challenge, and you definitely feel satisfaction when you finally make it.

Dee: You begin by using your starting money and initial tools to lay down a lobby and some income-producing units: offices interspersed with some fast-food joints, or a big floor full of fast food with stacks of condos.

Jay: Everything is shown in cutaway view, as if you've peeled away the front wall of your building. Once you click or drag to build something, little men start working on scaffolding and in no time at all, your unit is finished. If you've provided the proper access with stairs or elevators, spaces get rented and the tower starts to fill up: offices with furniture, fastfood joints with customers, condos with tenants, and so forth.

Dee: These are not actually animations, but set drawings that have several states, so it looks like animation. The restaurant has several pictures, for example, depending on its fullness threshold.

Jay: It was fun to watch, anyway. And the little people silhouettes actually are animations.

Dee: Yes, though they don't do much except stand and wait for elevators.

Jay: And turn first pink and then red with anger while they wait! It's kind of adorable watching them change color, until you realize that it means you're not handling your transportation system very well.

Dee: That seems to be a major focus of the game: making the elevators run on time. Carefully placed stairways can temper your tenants' frustrations, but the main puzzle seems to be deciding which are the key floors on which to buy elevator cars, and which cars should be set to direct-to-floor, which direct-to-lobby, and so on, at what times.

Jay: There's more detail in what you can do with the elevators than in any other part of the game. The designer's notes make it clear that elevators were the inspiration for the game; he even talks about how he called an elevator company and was told that information on elevator scheduling and management was "secret."

Dee: Hard to believe, but it certainly is difficult to keep everyone happy while expanding and making more money. Incidentally, on my normal Macintosh SI screen, there's a vicious bug having to do with the elevators.

Jay: Yeah. When the elevator display box comes up, the bottom two inches or so extend below the screen. And the box is so tall that it can't be lifted any higher to bring those two inches into view. There's probably a sizing button in the bottom-right box corner, but we can't reach it.

Dee: And those bottom two inches contain the bottom three floors of information, so you can't make certain settings for those floors. You also have to guess that pressing "return" will dismiss the box, since the OK button is not visible.

Jay: Did they have bigger monitors in playtest? Or are we missing something obvious?

Dee: Dunno. Maybe an astute reader, or someone at Maxis, will write and tell us. Meanwhile, that appears to be the only bug in the game.

Jay: So anyway, the elevators are a key to success; at the higher star ratings you can build express and service elevators. Service elevators are for maids (and only maids). Maids need access to clean your hotel rooms so they don't get infested with roaches. Express elevators shoot up 15 floors at a pop.

Dee: At even higher ratings, you can build escalators, which can handle an infinite load of passengers without keeping anyone waiting. I haven't yet gotten a high enough rating to build one.

Jay: I have, and they're cool! Which brings us to an interesting point: to get to those higher star ratings, where more and more stuff becomes available, takes time—a lot of time.

Dee: Even in fast mode, it may take half an hour to get to a two-star rating and another hour or two to get to three stars.

Jay: I bet you're thinking, "Two and a half hours isn't that long a playing time when you're earning an advancement to new resources. Lots of strategy games take that long to develop." Well, you're right—but in those games there's usually something to do while you're developing, like making the decisions that will bring you to the next stage.

Dee: SimTower, on the other hand, runs out of things to do at the low level rather quickly. In fact, you can spend the entirety of your initial funds in about 10 minutes. Then you have to wait for money to come in to afford more stuff; buy, then wait, buy, wait, buy, and finally you're in a position to go to the next rating.

Jay: So here's the gimmick, and you have to decide if you think this is cool or stupid: Spend your money, get things set up the way you like them, turn off all sounds except for special events, then work on something else. If your Mac has enough memory, you can use another piece of software while SimTower is running. Read a book, pet the dog, whatever—but stay next to the computer.

Dee: Then, when you start hearing the cash-register sound, you know the next fiscal quarter has started—or whatever it takes to get income. You flip back to Sim-Tower, spend your new money, check to see if you're close to the next rating, and flip back to whatever else you were doing.

Jay: Twenty minutes or an hour later, you hear the ka-ching again, and go back and buy some more. Sooner or later you're at the next star rating, and you take another half hour exploring all the new cool things you can do. Then you leave your tower purring contentedly to itself, and work on other things again.

Dee: We've left it on while we went out shopping, or even overnight. When you come back from an extended absence, you've accumulated a terrific amount of money.

Jay: It's only very rarely that a disaster has happened in your absence. In fact, only twice in all the hours we left the game running did something bad happen. I found one of my condo units had burned—probably a terrorist attack, but I wasn't there, and there's no message log to check back through. Fortunately, I had pretty good security forces, because only the one unit burned. The manual warns that your whole tower could go, and you might need to call in chopper rescue . . . hmm, actually, that could have been kind of interesting.

Dee: Yup, more of a thrill than when I got some cockroaches because I didn't set up my maid service right. It wasn't difficult to fix, though.

Jay: So there you have it: It's a game! It's a background tool! It's two products in one! If you want something that won't take a billion hours to play, and you like the idea of setting things up and letting them run while you go do other things, checking back only occasionally to tweak and build, then this product is like nothing else you could find. It's fun, exciting when you're actually building things, progresses to new levels of challenge, and looks great. I enjoyed it, and I give it * * * ½.

Dee: I can't decide how I feel. It's absorbing while you're doing it, and I did enjoy the thrill of flipping back when I heard the cash coming in to see what was happening, but it seems like a very strange way to get your entertainment, doing work until the "timer" rings and then playing for a bit and then going back to do more work. If that sounds cool to you, you'll love SimTower. I guess for me the bottom line is that I'm not running it in the background any more; some of the thrill is gone. But I'll still rate it a * * *.

D!Zone

for IBM PC & compatibles WizardWorks

Requires: Registered version of *Doom*1.666 or Room II 1.666; 486 or higher, 4MB RAM, DOS 3.3 or higher, CD ROM drive, VGA/SVGA graphics card, mouse,
Sound Blaster Pro card or compatible

Dee: Hey, why do so many computer companies and products have capital letters in the middle of their names?

Jay: Dunno, but they do, don't they? Like DeluxePaint and WordPerfect and MicroProse. Anyway, D!Zone is a "third-party" utility by WizardWorks for owners of Doom or Doom II. For those of you new to software jargon, the original publishers are the first party—in this case, id Software; you, the consumer, are the second party; and anybody else who gets into the act is a third party. You can buy third-party manuals, hint books, and add-ons for a lot of software, not just games.

Dee: Sometimes these outside guys have a unique perspective, or a particular feature they thought could be improved. In almost all cases, you need to own a legitimate copy of the original to take advantage of the third-party utility, and that's true of D!Zone. You must have either Doom or Doom II (version 1.666 or later) to play D!Zone.

Jay: You might think that all this emphasis on having a legitimate copy of Doom means that id Software is making some money from the sales of D!Zone, but in fact, they have nothing to do with it. That's not always the case with third-party products; some are licensed or authorized, and have some legal connection to the original publishers. D!Zone is an unauthorized add-on. id Software, as the box says, will not provide technical support for these "improvements."

Dee: The box says it has over 900 new levels, new sounds, utilities, music, graphic add-ons, game layouts, and maps. Sounds great! The box hype also uses the phrase "and much more" at least twice.

Jay: That's a bad sign. So what do you actually get? Well, when you boot up you're in an interface screen that looks like a programmer designed it—by which I mean that "graphics" and "user-friendly" are not concepts that were given serious thought.

Dee: It was pretty dry, wasn't it? But look at all the options! The screen's full of them!

Jay: Yes, but what do they all mean? Dee: Actually, it's kinda hard to tell. D!Zone, at least the CD version, comes with a single-sheet "Quick Start Guide" (Okay, so it's printed on both sides of the page, but the "page" is only 5½" by 8½", and all the rest of the documentation is online.

Jay: They're saving lots of trees—given how phenomenally popular the Doom series has become, this product is probably selling like hotcakes. And you never have to worry about misplacing the manual when you can just press F1 to scroll through it.

Dee: I guess you're right about that. But a consumer needs to know where to look—the Quick Start only mentions cryptically, "The DOCS directory contains documentation files."

Jay: "Documentation" is computerspeak for "the manual." I've always called myself an editor, but in a computer company, I'd be a documentation specialist. Dee: The online documentation is very skimpy, and I felt like I was pretty much on my own. It does carefully reproduce the screens you'll see in D!, the "shell" that lets you muck around with monsters and maps and things. But the manual is bogged down by typos and programmer-speak, and it assumes you, too, are intimate with the innards of pwad files.

Jay: What was all that about loading partial wads? I don't even know what a wad is, although I'm guessing its a chunk of programming that defines a particular episode of the game. Doom has cute names for each episode, such as "Knee Deep in the Dead," but wads are limited to eight characters just like regular DOS files. We just chose a named wad, and started it up.

Dee: To be exact, we tried to choose three wads from the huge list, but that prompted an error message. The documentation warned us against loading too many wads simultaneously, but we didn't think three was such a big number. Apparently it is. So we loaded one.

Jay: If you're expecting purple dinosaurs and exotic scenery, you'll be disappointed.

Dee: It looked like the regular game, gray walls and stairs and corridors and all. It was a different map, though. We didn't know what monsters to expect, or where.

Jay: D!Zone claims to be useful for first-time Doom players as well as seasoned veterans, but I think a first-timer is likely to have a hard enough time with the designers' original levels of lethality without randomizing monsters, making them respawn after you've finally killed them, or setting them on turbo-speed so that they come at you in double-time. These features strike me as much more interesting to fanatics who've "learned" all the levels they have and are panting for more.

Dee: True. Unfortunately, the randomizers are only so good—I saw plenty of monsters "stuck" in areas too small for them to move, just striding in place. Sometimes "impassable" objects are randomly dropped where they block you from completing a level. And sometimes things are randomized not to be too lethal, but too dull. Play balance pretty much goes out the window.

Jay: But randomization is just that: random. It's hardly fair to judge play balance using such a too—so the question is whether the predesigned levels are any good.

Dee: Bottom line? No.

Jay: I suspect the folks at id Software spent more time designing and playtesting their levels than the many designers of D!Zone's endless wads. If you want some hints on what's in each segment, don't rely on the "description" button—not one of the wads I checked had a description. I just kept getting the "no description" message over and over.

However, the shell programmers have thoughtfully included on your CD what look like Internet reviews of some of the options. These reviews by no means cover all the wads, but they're a start.

Dee: And, like the rest of this product, quantity rather than quality is the buzzword. The reviews had an awful lot of "Not such a good level" and "The designer really fell down on this one" type stuff.

Jay: Are we being too harsh on these guys? They say in their notes that they're just trying to earn money to finish college.

Dee: It's not "Simply Silly Software," the actual developer, that I have a real beef with: it's WizardWorks, a pro company that packages and distributes this. They're asking us to pay around $30 for something that isn't as smooth as a lot of the shareware I've bought. Downloading some net noodlings is one thing, but D!Zone comes packaged in a box just like a real game. And it's far from that.

Jay: We should mention that once again, we called the support number to ask about D!Zone. There's a little flier in the box that trumpets a contest to design new levels for Doom, using the editing tools also included on the D!Zone CD. I'm always interested in contests, but there wasn't any info on how to go about "including new graphics, music, characters, backgrounds, etc. . . ." I wanted to know: Do I have to be a programmer to enter?

Oh, no, I was told, just copy DEU521 into your Doom directory on your hard drive. Again, all the documentation is on diel

Dee: Yeah, and the first sentence of that documentation points out that DEU supports boolean logic. . . .

Jay: Boolean logic? Anaiieeee! I do have to be a programmer!

Dee: It's not quite that bad, but it is extremely difficult. The DEU tool is not something created by Simply Silly to be easily usable to craft Doom levels—it's a complex editor that was somewhere on the net, and WizardWorks "thoughtfully" provided it with the package. Again, it's not for first-time users. And don't anyone try to tell me that "Doom doesn't appeal to first-time users, so that's okay."

Jay: To summarize, D!Zone didn't impress us a lot. It's not user-friendly, it's not at all a beginner product—despite packaging claims to the contrary—and although there's a lot of stuff crammed onto the disk (over 1000 levels of varying, often dubious quality; level editors; buttons for all kinds of special effects), it seems awfully slipshod for the price.

Dee: It could, in fact, turn a new user sour on Doom, which is unfair to the folks at id Software. They spent a lot of time putting out a quality game. D!Zone is dragging those coattails as it's riding them. If you're a fanatic who is willing to put up with D!Zone's rough spots because you gotta have a new level, and you gotta have it now—well, there's plenty of new stuff here. From me, it gets a rating of * ½.

Jay: If you want to increase your fun-to-frustration ratio, check out an authorized Doom variant instead. I'll call this a *.

Heretic

for IBM PC and compatibles id Software

Requires: 486/33 or higher, 4MB RAM, Sound Blaster card or compatible

Dee: In fact, there is an authorized Doom variant out there, and it's called Heretic. Raven Software developed it, and id Software publishes it, which means they've given it a going-over, and it gets their stamp of approval.

Jay: Heretic doesn't go in for a lot of documentation, either, but it doesn't really need a lot. There's a page and a half of not particularly inspired story outlining the situation so far—but you don't play this game for the story line.

Dee: You're a Sidhe, one of the last members of an ancient elf race nearly annihilated by the three Serpent Riders. Disparil, the last Rider, is camped out in the City of the Damned, and you're going in after him. If you don't, "the earth shall be forever lost to the Abyss." For humanity's sake, your mission is to kill everything in sight.

Jay: The rest of the folded booklet shows you your weapons, your goodies (items and artifacts), and your foes. On the back side is a full-color poster, mage vs. monster.

Dee: The first thing that we noticed was the art: nice, atmospheric sky, good stone walls, torches, statues. Many of Doom's tricks, including teleporting platforms and secret doors, enliven the scenery.

Jay: Though your weapons are ethereal arrows and a wizard's wand, they function so similarly to Doom items that I heard the guys in the office declaiming, "Oh, yeah, that's pretty much the chain gun. Have you found the BFG yet?"

Dee: But there are new toys as well. If you find Inhilicon's Wings of Wrath, you can fly temporarily, and if you get Tyketto's Tome of Power, all your weapons are upgraded in power and awesomeness.

Jay: The descriptive text for the weapons is very Doom-like, using terms such as "bone-crunching" and "Watch 'em scream and burn—it's great!" I thought they were somewhat inappropriate, and made it obvious that this is just a Doom clone.

Dee: True to a great extent. Raven Software was obviously trying to appeal to the same players by using the same mood and much of the same tactical appeal in the setup of Heretic's levels. The game's not likely to grab fantasy fans who didn't like Doom, just because it has a fantasy setting.

Jay: So the question is, is it a good

Doom clone, or a bad Doom clone?

Dee: I think it's good. Some of the new items actually change the feel of the game a little by changing the tactics you employ. The best example of this is "Delmintalitar's Time Bomb of the Ancients" (*sigh*) which sounds stupid but is very useful: it's a time bomb that goes off one second after you slap the Enter key.

Jay: So now, if you know a room is full of monsters, or that a hoard will be released when you grab some item, you can drop a Time Bomb and skedaddle.

Dee: Exactly! You dash forward to trigger whatever beasts you'll face, back out of the room while slapping Enter, and there's the *crump* of an explosion followed by several monsters' screams of agony. It's very satisfying, not to mention something you cannot do in Doom. It requires timing and judgment as well, so it's not just a gimme.

Jay: One of my favorite differences from Doom can be used in a one-player game, but is most effective during multiplayer networked games, which Heretic supports just as Doom does.

Dee: It's called Torpol's Morph Ovum, and when you use it—

Jay: An incredulous shout rises from a nearby cubicle, "I have a beak!? What did you do to me?"

Dee: We don't want to mislead you, though. Despite one or two brand-new effects, Heretic is in fact exactly like Doom.

Jay: Almost every Doom player I know has discovered the best way to stay alive is to charge around the screen at full bore, holding that forward arrow key or throttling up the joystick so that you whip in and out of rooms before the monsters get a good target lock. Heretic is no different. In fact, after playing through the first two levels, I realized I was slightly nauseated from motion sickness.

Dee: Just wait till we review Descent! Jay: I'll have to go to the other room.

Dee: Some of the new features in Heretic don't seem to have been worth the effort. I spent a lot of time at first tilting "my head" up and down but quickly realized that, at the earlier levels at least, there was nothing on the floor or ceiling actually worth looking at.

Jay: What about those cool skulls hanging from the ceiling?

Dee: You can't affect them in any way—they're just decoration. Therefore, they're not worth the effort. Maybe there's some really good reason to tilt your head in later levels.

Jay: Another problem with Heretic is the saved games. We saved a game, came back the next day, and the saved game was corrupted.

Dee: Once again it was customer service time: The helpful folks on the other end of the line informed me that there are some serious bugs in the saved games, and that a patch would be available soon. In the meantime, they offered me two cheat codes to get me quickly back to the level I had been.

Jay: The problem with cheat codes is that once you know them, it's hard to avoid using them. Also, it's a bit tedious to replay levels even with all the weapons and items available. However, we will share one of the two codes with you (you'll have to learn about the other one somewhere else, since we don't want to give away all of id's secrets).

Dee: Skip Jay's next paragraph if you don't want to know a cheat.

Jay: From the initial options screen (New Game, etc.) type ENGAGExy (where x and y delineate the episode and level of the episode you want). You can go directly to any level in the game. Of course, you start with just the wizard staff and miss out on any weapons and goodies that you might have picked up in between.

Not a great cheat, but nice for sightseeing.

Jay: So our advice is, register your copy! That way, you'll get the patch when it becomes available. At least, you should.

Dee: Corrupted saved files is a pretty ferocious bug, but it doesn't happen every time and the game is otherwise plenty engaging and fun—for me, more fun than Doom (I like the extra touches and the monsters). I give it a rating of * * *, but if you loved Doom, you'd call this a * * * * *.

Jay: It's just another fast-action shooter to me. It's more amusing than Doom in some ways (especially going chicken hunting), and a little prettier. I give it * *.

Landstalker

for Sega Genesis Climax

Requires: Sega Genesis

Dee: On to another fantasy game, this one for the Sega Genesis system. It's called Landstalker, and it owes its allegiance to Legend of Zelda, Ultima, and all other computer "fantasy role-playing games." By which I mean that there's not much that's new here.

Jay: But within itself, the story and puzzles and activities are lots of fun and extremely addictive.

Dee: In the game, you're Nigel, a thief who gets recruited by the fairy Friday to hunt for the lost treasures of King Nole. Friday hangs out in your backpack as you go wandering about the game screens. If you're unfortunate and lose enough hit points to die, Friday revives you with doses of a plant called Eke-Eke (at least, she does as long as you've got some spare doses on you).

Jay: As with other Sega games, an insidiously sprightly "walking" tune burbles along with your every move, interspersed with ominous dungeon dirges and event music. When you can't stand it any more, turn your sound off. It's not necessary unless you're solving a time-sensitive puzzle, and you need to hear the chime of a button as it triggers some door or effect.

Dee: One annoying thing about the game is the set pieces of information dumping. There's one very early on in which you try to run through a waterfall. As far as we can tell, you can't succeed in jumping across the chasm . . . and when you fail, the game takes over for a whirlwind tour of several screens' worth of scenery you cannot affect (the equivalent of a computer game's opening animation).

Jay: Of course, being a Sega game, the text bar where conversations are recorded is very small. Any character who gives you a lot of information or a long conversation has to spread his speech over several screens' worth of text bars, which can be tedious.

Dee: The conversations aren't particularly inspired, and you don't often get to choose what to say (a choice between yes and no, at best).

Jay: In other words, don't look for roleplaying. The game is about moving your little isomorphic 3-D sprite around the rooms, swinging at monsters and solving little puzzles, gaining gold and buying new items and weapons.

Dee: Considering what we've just said, I could see why you all might have the impression we didn't like Landstalker. In fact, though, we did.

Jay: We came across it while browsing through the Sega section of our local Blockbuster store, and took it home for a weekend just to review it.

Dee: After returning it (with about six hours of playing time logged), I starting feeling antsy. I wanted to get those cool magical items I saw in the saved games that were on the rental cartridge (the previous renter had played for 21 hours!). I wanted to know what was in the next town. I wanted to see what other monsters and puzzles were in store. . . . I wanted to buy Landstalker for myself!

Jay: So we rushed down to our local toy store and purchased a copy. It was that addictive and interesting.

Dee: Sure I've played the same kind of game a million other times, but there are just some things about Landstalker I really liked.

Jay: You can pick things up and carry them around the screen; you also can put them down wherever you want, which can be amusing when you put them on top of other characters' heads (and they walk around with them). This ability also leads to several interesting puzzles involving placing crates as stepping- (or jumping-) stones, or blocking Indiana Jones-like rolling bails that would crush you.

Dee: There are teleport mazes and hidden stairways, buttons onto which you must jump—these open secret doors or lift platforms for you to ride—plenty of monsters, and lots of other nice touches.

Jay: Some of the puzzles involve splitsecond timing and good manual reflexes. These were an interesting blend of computer role-playing and arcade action, but not one I personally liked.

Dee: Neither did I. A couple were excessively frustrating, and I only managed to solve them after trying over and over again.

Jay: But you did solve every one, right? Dee: Well, yes. And I keep going back for more.

Jay: Even after your saved game got corrupted when you yanked the cartridge out without first turning off the Sega.

Dee: Yup. I was actually willing to start over again. Important Safety Tip #1: Don't ever yank out a cartridge without turning off the machine first. Tip #2: Use the "Copy" feature to copy your saved game four times.

Jay: Bottom-line time again: I enjoyed playing Landstalker and watching Dee play. I especially liked the way the bubble monsters quivered before I slashed at them. I found it difficult to use the controls effectively, and the game was a little too heavy on the arcade action, but all in all enjoyable. I rate it a * * *.

Dee: I wanted to buy it after playing it, and I still want to keep playing it. There's nothing much new and there are some frustrating parts, but mostly it's clever, well balanced, forward-going—and just plain fun. For me, it's a * * * *.

Jay: Gosh, look at the time! Look at the word count! As usual, we've burbled over our limit and we haven't finished reviewing all the games we were going to describe for you.

Dee: All right, we'll just have to wait till next time for Warcraft, and I guess we still owe everyone a Battlebugs review. We'll also take a look at the AL-QADIM® setting game and one or two others. See you in two, and keep those letters coming!

PLAYER'S OPTION<sup>TM</sup> rules preview, Part II: Skills & Powers excerpts

by Dale A. Donovan

Last issue, DRAGON® Magazine previewed the upcoming PLAYER'S OPTION rules Combat & Tactics book by printing an excerpt from the Critical Hits chapter. This month, we're bringing you two excerpts from the second PLAYER'S OPTION book: Skills & Powers.

For those who may be unaware, the PLAYER'S OPTION books each are 192-page hardcovers, packed full of variant and optional rules for the AD&D® game. Where the Combat & Tactics book concentrated on encounters in the game, the Skills & Powers tome (written by Doug Niles and myself) expands—and in some cases redefines—the character-creation process for the game. Look for the Combat & Tactics book in July and the Skills & Powers book this August.

The most important feature of the book is known as character points. Below is an excerpt from the first chapter listing all the uses character points serve in the PLAYER'S OPTION system. Following that is an excerpt from the Races chapter to serve as one example of how character points are used.

Character points

Every character begins play with a number of character points determined by his race and class. Further, every time a character advances a level, he gains 10 character points. The character point system is a new concept for the AD&D game. The points serve numerous purposes, and these are briefly summarized below.

- Character points are used to purchase weapon and nonweapon proficiencies, replacing the current proficiency "slots".
- Character points also are used to purchase traits, and bonus character points are awarded for taking disadvantages.

  Traits are minor advantages that help flesh out a PC. Some traits include acute hearing, light sleeper, and lucky. Disadvantages are minor impediments that also serve to define a character while providing a few additional character points for the player to spend. Sample disadvantages include allergies, poor vision, and a number of phobias.

- As the PC develops during the campaign, character points can be used to increase proficiency scores. One character point typically improves a proficiency score by a +1 permanent bonus. This allows PCs to "practice" certain skills and improve them over time.
- Character points are spent to acquire racial abilities for demihuman PCs, such as infravision, which most demihuman races possess or the elven attack bonus with swords or bows. Humans have no racial abilities and can spend their "racial" character points in other ways. This rule brings more diversity to the demihuman races; now not every elf in the PC party need have exactly the same racial abilities. (Of course, this applies to demihuman NPCs as well.) An excerpt from the "Races" chapter follows in the next section of this article.
- PCs can spend character points on acquiring the abilities of their chosen class (or classes if multi-classed), such as the paladin's capacity to lay on hands, or a ranger's tracking ability. Players cannot buy abilities from any class (or race, for that matter) for their PCs, but only from the class (and race) they choose for their characters.
- Priests and wizards can spend character points to gain extra spells. Only one additional spell per spell level can be purchased in this way. Of course, priests and wizards cannot purchase higher level spells than they currently can cast.
- Character points can be spent to improve a character's roll for additional hit points when advancing a level. For every 2 character points spent, the player can roll one additional die when determining new hit points, taking the highest single result of the dice rolled, not the total of all dice rolled.
- Character points also can be used in the course of the play, not just during character creation or between adventures.
   During a game session, a player can spend saved character points to give her character a second chance to accomplish a feat, reroll a failed attack, saving throw, proficiency check, or even a low damage roll. Spending character points in this manner does not insure success, just another chance to succeed.

For example, Jennifer chooses to save 2 character points after creating her fighter character. During a game, Jennifer's fighter tries to strike an ogre. The attack roll fails. However, the ogre strikes the fighter, wounding her badly. In the next round, fearing for her fighter's life, Jennifer declares-before she rolls any dice-that she will spend character points if this attack misses. The roll indeed fails, and Jennifer now spends a point and rerolls the attack. If this attack roll succeeds, the first roll is ignored and Jennifer's fighter has struck the ogre. If the reroll failed, Jennifer's character still misses and play continues.

Regardless of any reroll's success, any character points spent are lost. Players can continue to spend points as long as they declare to do so before rolling any dice—and as long as they have points to spend. This mechanic allows characters a second chance to accomplish important tasks or to achieve feats vital to the story.

Races

Each race [sic] detailed below receives a number of character points that can be spent on racial abilities. This lets players personalize their characters—no longer need every dwarf have exactly the same racial abilities, skills, and bonuses. It is still possible to purchase the standard racial abilities as outlined in the Player's Handbook—these are featured in ability packages in each race's description. Two exceptions to this are the half-orc and halfogre hybrid races, which do not appear in the PHB.

Racial variants

Numerous off-shoot races can be used as player characters. For example, a player fond of dwarven characters could choose from the hill, gray, or deep varieties. Players who select such a character can purchase the standard abilities of the parent race or buy from the list of abilities specific to the racial variant selected. For example, a player of a deep dwarf charac-

Dwarves

Dwarves are a short, stocky race, averaging about 4-4½′ tall. They have ruddy complexions, dark hair, and piercing, dark eyes. The natural lifespan for a dwarf is about 350 years. They are a serious lot, given rarely to frivolity. They prefer a good, hard day's work. Though sometimes considered dour or taciturn, few doubt the dwarves' bravery. They have little talent for magic, but excel at fighting, warcraft, and arts such as engineering.

Dwarves typically live in hilly or mountainous regions, enjoying the strength of the earth and rocks that make up their underground homes. Dwarves mine the earth for precious metals and gems, and they are fond of gold in particular.

Because of their resistance to magic, dwarves have difficulty using enchanted items. All magical items not specially suited the dwarfs character class have a 20% chance (on 1d100 roll) to malfunction. A check for malfunction is made every time the dwarf attempts to use the item. If the check is passed, the item works until it is turned off, put away, or its duration expires. If the check fails, the magical qualities of the item cannot be called upon, though the item might function normally the next time the dwarf tries to use it. Malfunction checks apply to magical wands, rods, staves, rings, amulets, potions, horns, and jewels. The checks do not apply to dwarven clerics using clerical magical items, and to weapons, shields, armor, gauntlets, and girdles. If a dwarf possesses a cursed item and it malfunctions, the dwarf recognizes the nature of the item and is able to safely dispose of it.

A dwarven character might choose to be a fighter, cleric, or thief. A dwarf also can be multi-classed as a fighter/cleric or a fighter/thief.

Dwarven abilities

Players who choose dwarves for their characters have 45 character points to spend on racial abilities. Following are the basic racial abilities, as per the PHB—these can be purchased as a package for 40 character points, or individually for 5 character points each. Racial variant characters cannot purchase the basic package, but must buy skills individually from the basic list and the list that corresponds to their race.

For example, Jennifer wants to create a deep dwarf fighter, and she has 45 points to work with. She chooses the determine depth underground, detect sliding or shifting walls, and infravision abilities from the basic skills. These cost 15 points. With 30 points left, she chooses six deep dwarf abilities, one of which is a 30' infravision range. Because the infravision ability has been selected from both lists, the abilities are added together, and the dwarf fighter has a 90' infravision range.

Abilities indicated with a cost 5 character points when purchased individually.

- Language package: Dwarves have contact with other subterranean races, giving them the opportunity to learn the languages of these peoples. The base list of languages for dwarven PCs includes: common, dwarf, gnome, goblin, kobold, and orc. Some dwarven off-shoots have access to additional languages.
- Magic resistance: Dwarves are naturally nonmagical and can never use wizard spells. This natural resistance to all things magical grants dwarves a bonus to saving throws vs. magical wands, staves, rods, and spells. It also applies vs. any poisonous or toxic substances that a dwarf could encounter. This bonus is determined by the dwarfs Health sub-ability score [sic]. For every 3½ points of Health, the dwarf receives a +1 bonus. These bonuses are summarized on the chart below.

Health Saving Throw Bonuses Score Bonus 4-6 +1 7-10 +2 11-13 +3 14-17 +4 18-20 +5

- Melee combat: Dwarves have a +1 bonus to their attack rolls vs. orcs, halforcs, goblins, and hobgoblins. Further, when ogres, half-ogres, ogre magi, trolls, giants, or titans fight dwarves, these aggressors suffer a -4 penalty on all attack rolls because the dwarves have defensive tactics against these large foes.
- Infravision: Dwarves have infravision to 60 feet—the ability to see heat patterns given off by living warm-blooded creatures in the dark.

Underground skills: Dwarves are skilled miners, and when they pass within 10' of a particular phenomenon, they can:

- Detect any grade or slope in the passage they are passing through, 1-5 on 1d6.
- Detect new tunnels, passages, or underground construction, 1-5 on a 1d6.
- Detect any sliding or shifting walls or rooms, 1-4 on a 1d6.
- Detect any stonework traps, pits, or deadfalls, 1-3 on a 1d6.
- Determine the approximate depth underground, 1-3 on a 1d6.

Dwarves must consciously use these abilities. For example, a dwarf could not automatically detect a pit in the corridor ahead unless the dwarfs player stated that the character was actively searching for such things.

Deep dwarves

As their name implies, deep dwarves live farther underground than their hill or mountain relatives. They prefer the security and the isolation that living far beneath the earth provides.

The typical deep dwarf is 4-4½′ tall and weighs 120 pounds. They are large-boned, but thinner than their cousins who live closer to the surface, and they can move easily through the narrow tunnels they dig in the bedrock.

Deep dwarves seldom have contact with creatures from the surface—few such creatures can reach remote underground places—and the deep dwarves feel no need to dig tunnels to the surface. Most deep dwarves are neutral, lawful neutral, or chaotic neutral. Players may choose any alignment for their deep dwarf characters.

Special abilities

The following racial abilities are available to deep dwarves at the cost of 5 character points each. No ability on this list can be purchased more than once.

- 30' of infravision, due to the deep dwarves' extensive time spent in the dark underground.
- +1 attack bonus with the war hammer, as the deep dwarves use such items in digging their tunnels.
- +1 attack bonus with any crossbow, as dwarves are practiced in the use of these weapons. Hurled weapons' ranges are limited in tunnels and other bows require large pieces of wood.
- +1 bonus to saving throws vs. magic, due to their nonmagical nature.
- Because they are especially hardy, they can gain an additional +1 bonus to saving throws vs. poisonous and toxic substances.
  - A Constitution score bonus of +1

because the deep dwarves are accustomed to the cold and often damp Underdark.

• Language package: Deep dwarves can speak their own racial dialect, gray dwarf, illithid, troglodyte, deep gnome, and undercommon (the trade language of all Underdark races).

Racial penalties

All deep dwarves suffer a -1 penalty to all rolls when in bright sunlight or within the radius of a continual light spell. Light spells and all other light sources have no effect on a deep dwarf.

Gray dwarves

Also known as duergar, gray dwarves live far underground—at times even beyond the deep dwarves. Since they occasionally reside near each other, gray and deep dwarves can come into conflict over the resources of the Underdark.

An average gray dwarf is about 4' tall and weighs 120 pounds. The thinnest of the subraces, gray dwarves almost appear emaciated. Most are bald, and those who are not usually shave their heads. Their beards are white or a dingy gray. Gray dwarves rarely venture above ground, as they find sunlight painful to their eyes.

Most gray dwarves are lawful evil in alignment, with neutral tendencies. Player character gray dwarves can be of any alignment.

Special abilities

The following abilities are available to gray dwarves at the cost of 5 character points each. No ability from this list can be purchased more than once.

- +1 attack bonus with the military pick, due to the gray dwarves' practiced use of such items in digging tunnels.
- Because dwarves favor crossbows, they gain a +1 attack bonus with any crossbow. Hurled weapons are limited in tunnels, and other bows require large pieces of wood that are not available.
- -1 penalty applied to opponent's surprise rolls, because gray dwarves are stealthy.
- +1 bonus to saving throws vs. magic because of gray dwarves' resistance to enchantments.
  - +1 bonus to saving throws vs. poisonous and toxic substances.

- A Constitution score bonus of +1 because the deep dwarves are accustomed to the cold and often damp Underdark.
- Language package: Gray dwarves begin with their own tongue, deep dwarf, dark elf, illithid, kuo-toa, troglodyte, and undercommon.

Racial penalties

Gray dwarves suffer a -2 penalty on all rolls when exposed to bright sunlight or continual light spells. Other light sources do not impair them.

Other dwarves distrust duergar, and as such, duergar suffer an initial -2 penalty to reaction rolls from their cousins.

Hill dwarves

Hill dwarves live in areas of rolling hills, often dwelling underground, though they have outposts on the surface.

A typical hill dwarf stands 4' tall and weighs about 150 pounds. He is well-muscled and stocky, with tan or brown skin, dark hair, and bright eyes. Hill dwarves prefer earth tones and seldom wear jewelry. They are the most common of all the dwarven varieties, as they adapt well to life above and below ground. Most hill dwarves are lawful good, but player characters can be of any alignment.

Special abilities

Hill dwarves can choose the following abilities at the cost of 5 character points each. The abilities on this list cannot be purchased more than once.

- +1 bonus to attack rolls with hand or battle axes.
- +1 bonus on attack rolls with the war hammer.
- +1 bonus to attack rolls with military picks.
- +1 bonus on attack rolls with the footman's mace.
- +1 bonus to attack rolls with short swords.
- +1 bonus to attack rolls with any crossbow.
  - +1 bonus to saving throws vs. magic.
- +1 bonus to saving throws vs. poisonous or toxic substances.
  - +1 bonus to their Constitution score.
- Language package: Hill dwarves can select any six tongues from among those listed in the various dwarven language packages.

Racial penalties

Hill dwarves suffer no particular penalties other than those mentioned in the basic dwarves listing above.

This month, our sage unravels mysteries from all corners of the AD&D® game multiverse, from how amulets of life protection really work to where deities live.

An amulet of life protection works against all sorts of potent mental attacks, but how does its second power, the ability to hold the wearer's psyche for up to seven days before it departs to the plane of its alignment, work? A raise dead spell can help a person who has been dead longer than seven days, so what's the point?

If one assumes that at death a character's psyche departs to the plane of its alignment, then the amulet's second power becomes obvious. It prevents the character from dying until seven days have passed. If "killed" the wearer remains at 0 hit points (or -10 hit points if you use the Hovering at Death's Door optional rule) until the character's hit points are brought back into positive numbers by magical healing or until seven days pass, in which case the character really dies and must be raised or resurrected (if that is possible).

Most DMs also will allow a character with an amulet of life protection to be raised or resurrected even if the character's body has been destroyed, as long as the amulet survives. In any case, the wearer can be raised or resurrected even after being killed by a death spell or a demilich or by any other special attack that would otherwise slay the victim irrevocably.

How does one deal with armor for bariaur characters from the PLANESCAPE<sup>TM</sup> setting? How much does the armor cost and how does it work?

I recommend treating armor for a bariaur or centaur as horse barding, but add

15% to the cost and weight to account for the creatures' humanoid foreparts. So chain mail would cost 575 gp and weigh 80 pounds. If the armor normally grants an armor class better than the character's natural armor class, the character gets the better one, AC 5 in the case of chain mail. Otherwise, the character's armor class improves by one; for example, a bariaur in leather would have an armor class of 5. A shield improves a bariaur's or centaur's armor class by one, but only against attacks coming from the front.

I have a bariaur paladin character in my PLANESCAPE campaign who is rapidly approaching the level where the character is allowed a bonded mount. Now bariaurs might have a little difficulty riding horses or anything else for that matter. What should I do?

You might consider allowing the character to meet and win some kind of animal companion or perhaps a follower, such as rangers gain.

Can a psionicist stack defense slots to increase his power score in the same way the character can for normal sciences and devotions?

Yes. A psionicist can improve a defense mode's power score by devoting an extra slot to it instead of choosing a new defense mode when the character qualifies for one. A character with access to the telepathy discipline also can improve a defense mode's power score by devoting a telepathy slot to a defense mode he already knows.

Is there an easy way to determine a monster's level for the purpose of constructing my own tables for monster summoning spells?

The original AD&D game used a creature's experience point value to determine its level for purposes of random encounter and summoning tables. Here's something similar for the current game:

XP value Monster level

35	1st (monster summoning I)
120	2nd (monster summoning II)
270	3rd (monster summoning III)
650	4th (monster summoning IV)
1,400	5th (monster summoning V)
4,000	6th (monster summoning VI)

6,000 7th (monster summoning VII)

The numbers above are maximum values; if a creature's experience value exceeds the listing for a given level it belongs in the next higher category. Feel free, however, to adjust things a little bit when building summoning tables of your own. The creatures listed on the monster summoning tables in the MONSTROUS MANUAL<sup>TM</sup>, Book for example, don't always match this table.

Just what abilities do player character specialty priests of the deities from the Legends & Lore tome get? Specifically, priests of Tyaa get thief abilities. Which thief abilities? Priests of Odin or of the Valkyries must meet fighter requirements, does this mean they get warrior abilities such as multiple attacks and ability to roll for exceptional Strength scores? A priest of Horus is a paladin, but how much of a paladin?

If the deity's description says specialty priests get particular abilities, then PC specialty priests get those abilities. Make sure you understand what you're reading before handing out extra character abilities, though.

For example, priests of Odin must meet the qualifications for fighters (Strength 9) in addition to the requirements for priests (Wisdom 9), but gain no other fighter abilities beyond what is listed on page 175 of L&L (one extra hit point per level and a fighter's THACO once the character reaches 10th level). Priests of the Valkyries have the same requirements, but always use the warrior combat and saving throw tables. In both cases, the characters are still priests; they use the priest experience tables and gain no other warrior abilities.

Priests of Tyaa literally are thieves with spell-casting abilities. They use the rogue combat and saving throw tables but the priest experience tables. They gain the full slate of thief abilities, are limited to leather armor, and have six-sided hit dice.

Priests of Horus function as paladins except that they cast spells as priests and turn undead as priests five levels lower than their actual levels. Priests of Horus use the paladin combat, experience, and saving throw tables. To maintain game balance, you might want to give them eight-sided hit dice instead of l0-sided hit dice and you might also want to limit their bonus hit points from high Constitution scores to +2 per die.

Just how much stuff can a character carry? I mean, how many things can you cram into a backpack or belt pouch before the thing bursts and how many weapons can a character stash on his body before he become immobile?

A character can carry as much equipment as his encumbrance limit allows (see PHB, Table 1, page 14). Capacities for common containers are given in the PHB as well (see Table 50, page 78); a backpack holds 50 pounds and a large belt pouch holds 8 pounds.

Technically, a character can carry any number if items if the items' total weight does not exceed the character's encumbrance limit. The DM can, however, impose a little common sense if a player starts going over the top. Generally speaking, a character can carry one size M weapon (such as a long sword or a battle axe) on one hip, and a size S weapon (such as a hand axe or short sword) on the other hip. A bandolier over a man-sized character's torso can hold about three size S weapons, and a character who really wants to be armed to the teeth probably can carry two or three very compact size S weapons, such as daggers, strapped to each leg (bulkier weapons such as short swords and war hammers can't be this way if the character wants to walk nor-

Two-handed weapons such as long bows, pole arms, and two-handed swords really can't be carried anywhere but in a character's hands. One two-handed weapon can be strapped across a man-sized character's back, but the character is going to have a very hard time getting at it quickly. You can figure the character is going to blow a whole round getting the weapon loose, and that is possible only if the character has taken the care to lash it carefully and provide some kind of snap or hook at the shoulder so that the weapon can be pulled loose quickly. Without such precautions, the character probably will have to spend two rounds getting the weapon ready or stand still for a round while a companion undoes all the knots.

Of course, a character can cram 50 pounds of weapons into his backpack, provided that all the weapons are no more than three feet long, but getting to them in a hurry is a real problem—out of the question if the character also has a two-handed weapon strapped to his back.

The dispel magic spell description says that it removes spells and spell-like effects from devices and innate abilities. Does this mean that the spell can remove or suppress a creature's magical ability? For instance, can a drow's ability to cast darkness #### be taken away (even temporarily) by a dispel magic spell?

A dispel magic removes magical effects, not magical abilities. A spell-caster or magical creature can't be magically neutralized by a dispel magic spell the way a magical item can. The spell, however, can disrupt a spell while it is being cast just like an attack can. An innate ability can't be disrupted the way a spell can, it could be dispelled the moment it takes effect if the initiative roll is right,

In an old issue, you said a character using a magical war hammer and wearing a girdle of giant strength and gauntlets of ogre power would gain all the attack and damage bonuses from the two Strengthenhancing items, actual Strength score, the magical weapon, and specialization, if any. What were you thinking? A character with a 17 Strength score, a war hammer +2, a girdle of hill giant strength, and gauntlets of ogre power would gain a +9 attack bonus and a +16 damage bonus. Kind of scary, don't you think? If the character is a fighter and also drinks a potion of fire giant strength do the bonuses rise to +12/+25?

This is an old one, but I had two questions about it this month, so here goes:

What was I thinking? Why, I was thinking about what the rules say. In the both versions of the AD&D game, a character who has a magical war hammer of any kind, any girdle of giant strength, and gauntlets of ogre power gains the ability to do the Thor routine and really smash up the opposition by adding up the combat bonuses from all the items and the character's normal Strength score bonus to boot. The fateful line of text that makes this possible can be found on page 145 of the original DMG and on page 170 of the current DMG. Bonuses from a potion of giant strength are never added into this bonanza of combat bonuses (a potion being neither girdle nor gauntlet, nor normal). Note that a character must have all three items, girdle, gauntlets, and war hammer, to get the super bonus. So, if the DM only give out two of three items, no PC in the game can get the combined bonuses.

Are the combined bonuses scary? Well, scary is a relative term. Even your +9/+16 tactical nuke on legs is likely to take pause if she meets something that just doesn't care about how much damage an opponent can inflict. A vampire wizard using a fire shield spell might just ruin the tactical nuke's day, even if the vampire only gets to stick around for a round or two before being forced into gaseous form or being turned by the party priest.

In case you're not quite following me here, remember that vampires just don't care much about damage that doesn't come in the form of sharpened stakes in the heart; other forms of damage just force them into gaseous form until they can regenerate the damage. Also remember that fire shield spells turn physical attacks into magical zaps that inflict just as much damage on the attacker as the attacker inflicts on the target. So every time the character hits for mega-damage she also suffers mega-damage.

No, to really "scare" me you'd have to add a ring of vampiric regeneration, armor of etherealness, and a cloak of displacement to the tactical nuke. Now there's a character that could make the tarrasque think about retiring and taking up collectible card games.

The moral of the story is DMs should be careful when handing out magical treasures, especially girdles of giant strength and magical war hammers (even war hammers +1). If you find that your players have used their characters' magical items to create killing machines that really scare you, it's time to start thinking about what might scare the killing machines. (What would happen to the PCs if the spell-casting vampire had two or three hasted pet rust monsters and had dropped a few phase door spells in strategic locations?)

When an item or special ability allows a damage multiplier, exactly what gets multiplied?

Generally, only the damage dice roll gets multiplied; bonuses from Strength, magic, etc. get added after the multiplier. Check the item or ability description, if it doesn't specifically say that bonuses are multiplied, then only the damage dice are.

What special abilities does the caster gain when using the ninth-level wizard spell shapechange? For instance, the character changes into a drow to sneak past a drow patrol. What happen to the caster if she is killed while in an assumed form?

According to the spell description (PHB, page 196). The caster gains all the assumed form's abilities except those dependent on intelligence, innate magical abilities, and magic resistance. In your example, the shapechanged character gains a drow's superior infravision and that's all. If killed in an assumed form, the caster remains in that form until the spell expires. The spell description mentions that dying in an assumed form might make revivification difficult, but the assumed form is not permanent, and can interfere with attempts to raise or resurrect the character only while the spell lasts.

It seems to be a lot easier for priests to enchant items than it is for wizards. I mean, any high-level priest can just plop a sword on an altar and after a few dozen days he's got a holy avenger while the poor wizard is still out there trying to get a decent sword made. Why are the rules set up this way?

They aren't. A priest prays over an item to enchant it, not to manufacture it. The item can go onto an altar to be enchanted only if it is an appropriate vessel for the deity's power. An item becomes an appropriate vessel only after the priest has gone through all the steps to make it suitable for enchantment, just as a wizard must do.

How do specialists who can't cast enchantment/charm spells recharge magical items? (The enchant an item spell is an enchantment/charm.)

Technically, they can't. If this bothers you, go ahead and add enchant an item to the evocation/invocation school as well as the enchantment/charm school. If you do so, you're saying that magic can be invoked into an item (which is what priests do anyway) as easily as it can be enchanted into an item. Since creating and recharging magical items is something of a class ability for wizards, game balance in your campaign won't suffer.

Can specialists use scroll spells from their opposing schools? The text on page 145 of the DMG seems to say that they can. Also, just how far does the prohibition against specialist wizards using magical items from their opposing schools go? Can an illusionist use a potion of healing, which is pretty clearly a necromantic item?

Any wizard character can read any wizard spell from a scroll (although there might be a chance for failure if the character reading the scroll isn't of sufficient level to cast the spell).

I recommend that you allow specialist wizards to use freely any items that can be used by all character classes, even when they duplicate effects from their opposition schools. This includes the majority of potions, and most rings and miscellaneous magical items. Any item, however, that can be used only by wizards, or only by wizards and priests, is off-limits to a specialist if it duplicates an effect from the character's opposition schools. Any character, for example, can use a potion of healing, even an illusionist. An illusionist also can use a wand of magic missiles, but the character must make attack rolls when firing the missiles, just as a non-wizard does.

Would a character die if she viewed a symbol of death through a wall of force (assuming she had 80 hit points or less)?

Yes she would. While a wall of force blocks spells, it doesn't block vision. Spells that have visual triggers, such as symbols and illusory script work on characters who see them, walls of force not withstanding. Gaze attacks also work this way.

Hey! When are you going to list Tome of Magic priest spell spheres for the deities in Monster Mythology? How about home planes for these deities?

If you look carefully at the entries in Monster Mythology you'll see that spheres from the Tome of Magic are included.

Unless stated otherwise in the description (or in a PLANESCAPE product), a deity's primary residence is on the outer that reflects the deity's alignment. For example, Corellon Larethian makes his abode on Arborea, along with the rest of the elven pantheon (although elven deities who are not chaotic good probably have formal residences on their alignment planes and only have modest residences on Arborea).

THE ARMLESS MAIDEN

or 0-312-85234-7 $22.95

Much effort has been devoted of late to rediscovering and reinventing the fairy tale for modern audiences. Some editions of the Brother's Grimm, we're told, were adapted to avoid unduly frightening young readers, and "politically correct" bedtime stories have made best-seller lists. Now veteran editor and folklorist Terri Windling presents a gathering of socially conscious fairy tales focusing on childhood and child abuse. While the stories are compelling and clever, the anthology's moral agenda often gets in the way of the contents.

There's a certain irony to this affliction. Windling has gathered powerful stories full of angst and subtext, largely but not universally dark in tone. What she overlooks is that such fiction speaks most eloquently on its own behalf. Just as the best way to enjoy Shakespeare is in the theater, the best way to appreciate these tales is to read the stories. Windling's fervent introduction and often-pointed individual comments are well-meant but counterproductive. Likewise, her account of her own difficult upbringing distracts attention from the fiction rather than accenting it.

The stories themselves are at least as graphic, if not more so. Particularly shocking are Jane Yolen's "Allerleirauh" and a "Sleeping Beauty" recasting from Tanith Lee. Horror novelist Peter Straub contributes an opaque but equally unsettling contemporary tale, while Charles de Lint's entry is quieter and more intimate yet still tragically plausible.

Though most of the stories recast classic European tales, there's a certain amount of ethnic diversity. Most notable in this regard are a rite-of-passage story by Ellen Steiber with an Amerindian flavor, and a Hans Christian Andersen tale skillfully transplanted to Japan by Kara Dalkey.

Nor, fortunately, is the mood of the anthology entirely dark. Dr. Annita Harlan's "Princess in Puce" is one of several Cinderella retakes, this one a sardonic modern version. Steven Gould's "The Session" telegraphs its punch line a touch too soon, but gets to it wittily enough to make the trip worthwhile. Ellen Kushner's straightforward ghost story offers a satisfying resolution, and Joanna Russ provides the volume's one genuinely nostalgic tale.

A liberal sprinkling of poetry also appears, mostly smooth but not memorable. The exceptions are a perceptive lyric from Emma Bull and "Reading the Brothers Grimm to Jenny" by Lisel Mueller; these two, especially Bull's "Stepsister's Story," evocatively balance thoughtfulness and craft. Of the similar scattering of personal essays, most can be ignored, although Tappan King's and Ellen Steiber's comments on their own stories are cogent and readable.

The volume is best not read in one great gulp, even if one wisely concentrates only on the fiction. Windling's contributors craft a frequently disturbing portrait of a child's universe, one that's best taken in modest doses over time. This too is curious in a way, for in fairy tales, storytellers often possess the power of creation, the means to reshape the world as we might wish it to be. Strange, in that context, that a book advocating humane treatment of children (many contributors' payments, says Windling, were donated to such causes) should dwell so persistently on the inhumane.

Yet Windling's eye for quality fiction is keen. The Armless Maiden includes much unnecessary baggage, but among the contents are more than enough gems to justify its existence.

CAT'S PAW L. A.Taylor Ace 0-441-00181-5 $4.99

A lighthouse-keeper's reserved wife goes in search of her missing husband. Some folk in authority lend quiet support, some display profound disinterest, and others urge her to abandon her hunt. But Miranda persists in studying newspapers, talking to innkeepers, eluding genteel pursuers, and denying charges of witchcraft, all the while taking good care of her recently acquired stray cat. For there is, she well knows, no such thing as magic. . . .

The world of L. A. Taylor's Cat's Paw is a lightly sketched yet oddly convincing realm that is neither quite English nor quite Victorian, though there are strong echoes of both in the descriptions. Taylor's rural village of Gwynnhead and bustling town of Bierdsey are altogether cheerier and fresher, for instance, than the London streets familiar to readers of Charles Dickens or Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. On the other hand, they're definitely cousins of the various almost-Englands invented by British fantasist Diana Wynne Jones, if rather calmer and less exotic than most of Jones' settings.

Taylor spins a story that is part mystery and part character study, and which plays both roles skillfully. Though Miranda's progress frequently seems slow to nonexistent, little that happens truly is without purpose or relevance. Readers may well discern certain key points long before Miranda does, but even that knowledge won't spoil the suspense. The pleasure of the tale lies as much in watching Miranda gradually find and assert her own brand of self-confidence as in unraveling the various puzzles woven around her husband's disappearance.

This also is one of the rare cases in which the novel's packaging and design deserve special mention. Gary Overacre provides striking cover art, in which unusually sized elements combine with astute color selection to create an image that stands out among fantasy covers while remaining true to the book's intimate, down-to-earth tone. Equally startling is the uncluttered title typography, which shows admirable restraint in a genre crowded with ornate series logos and banner designs. The overall effect is a distinctiveness rare in the genre and well-matched to Taylor's narrative.

In a legitimate sense, Cat's Paw accurately can be called a very old-fashioned novel, with qualities of politeness and formality that contrast sharply with the brash irreverence typical of modern humorous fantasy or cyberpunk SF. But there's also a fierce intimacy in Taylor's prose, and the virtues of her tale and its heroine are themselves qualities worthy of being preserved and emulated.

THE BOOK OF EARTH Marjorie R. Kellogg DAW O-88677-574-4 $4.99

Marjorie R. Kellogg creates sophisticated characters, portrays the medieval Church with better-than-average complexity, and puts a reasonably interesting spin on her dragons. But The Book of Earth confuses more than it satisfies, and no small part of the problem is that while Kellogg's ideas are generally good, she packs too many of them into a relatively tight, narrowly focused narrative.

One major puzzle involves the setting. The prologue implies the existence of many Worlds as it describes the creation of one in particular, accomplished by the work of four elemental dragons. These cues suggest a typically anonymous high fantasy. Yet the text later refers to Germany and Rome by name, and the Church of the novel's World clearly is of the Roman Catholic persuasion. This implies historical milieus, especially as the ecclesiastical descriptions suggest significant research on Kellogg's part. But the dragons and magical elements of the unfolding story follow no historical parallel or mythological pattern, and the mix of the authentic and the wholly imaginary is odd and dis-

This first novel of a planned quartet is the story of Erde, daughter and only child of the moderately important Baron von Alte. Erde is a complicated young woman in a difficult household; the widowed Baron has kept only a loose eye on her upbringing, and she is thus both bettereducated and more physically active than most girls of her age and station. So when circumstance brings a fiery, Armageddonpreaching monk to the Baron's castle just as Erde's hormones kick into high gear, disaster ensues and Erde must flee for her life. Worse, one shocking piece of news steals Erde's voice from her in the course of the escape.

Kellogg channels the viewpoint firmly through Erde's thoughts and perceptions, and the combination of her heroine's psychological struggles and Brother Guillemo's powerful witch-hunter's theology promises serious emotional and philosophical conflict. What we get, however, is a surprisingly pedestrian quest story that is oddly light at times. Erde and her new-met companions, the dragon Earth and rogue knight Hal Engle, must find the source of a siren-like summons that only the dragon can hear. Their search takes on an almost Yellow Brick Road-like character, complete with a hidden valley populated by people entirely too nice to survive in the outside world.

A further problem is that while Earth is undeniably and dramatically real, there's little back story explaining his history or presence. The dragon himself has no memory of his origins (and doesn't learn to "speak" till the very end of the book), and neither do most of the characters possess folklore or legend as to Earth's nature. This degree of mystery is out of step with logic; Kellogg has dropped her dragon into the milieu with no corresponding body of myth, however thinned by time, to describe his role in it.

It is, at least, a consistent failing. The Book of Earth raises any number of challenging ideas and intriguing situations, but Kellogg really never explores any of them. The result is like adding a jar of chili powder to a pot of chili and then forgetting to stir it properly—one gets very bland chili with little clumps of spice that burn out one's taste buds.

Kellogg has the virtue of ambition; it's a major technical challenge to stage-manage a novel whose protagonist can't talk most of the time. But it's mostly unrealized ambition; the best readers can hope for is that the promised sequels prove more capably executed than this initial offering.

DOC SIDHE Aaron Allston Baen O-671-87662-7 $5.99

With his novel, Galatea in 2-D, veteran game designer Aaron Allston demonstrated the ability to take an exotic concept—fantasy art brought to life—to its ultimate conclusion in logical and thoroughly entertaining fashion. Doc Sidhe applies a similar principle to an even weirder premise: suppose that pulp hero Doc Savage was real—and that he was an elf, pointy ears and all?

That's the idea behind Allston's new novel, and it's carried out with a style and panache that combines the classic machine-gun action of the original pulp adventures with a slightly irreverent, up-to-date wit. Where the recent series of new Doc Savage yarns from Bantam kept firmly to the period and tone of the original novels, Allston gives his twist on the concept a neat double-backspin that allows him to both emulate that tone and incorporate a more modern worldview.

The '90s viewpoint comes from small-time kickboxer Harris Greene, whose career has taken a nosedive of late despite Harris' prior Olympic success. A series of incidents involving his sometime fiancee Gaby propels Harris from present-day Earth into a semi-parallel realm, where technology runs fifty-odd years behind ours, elves and humans dwell side by side, and magic works far more effectively than does traditional science.

In that world, Harris is found and taken in by the aides of one Desmond MaqqRee, known to friends and foes alike as the brilliant and enigmatic Doc Sidhe. Doc comes complete with a personal skyscraper, a fleet of classic cars, an assortment of exotic weapons, and a small cadre of associates nearly as capable and eccentric as he is. Yet Doc Sidhe isn't quite a ringer for Doc Savage; his elven origins make him a more openly mystical figure, and he's a bit less aloof than his pulp predecessor. Then, too, one of his aides is martial artist Noriko Nomura, who'd give Emma Peel of The Avengers a solid workout; in this sense, Allston's Doc is a good deal more enlightened than the Doc Sav-

One of Doc's old enemies, it develops, has launched a complex plot to alter the nature of the binding that links Doc's world with ours. If successful, he'll acquire the wherewithal to control both realms, but first he must eliminate Gaby and Harris, whose very presence in Doc's "fair world" renders the scheme impossible. Nor can Doc himself be allowed to survive, for reasons that only Duncan Blackletter knows—until Gaby, in the course of mastering hitherto unsuspected gifts, manages to unravel the secret.

Allston keeps the pace lively, the repartee brisk, and the goon squads well-populated, but he tempers the violence with a bit more conscience than existed in the original pulps. While this is clearly fantasy rather than SF, he offers a remarkably well-developed cosmology for the twinned universes that cleverly explains, more or less, why elves would want to build office towers of checkered green and white marble.

If there's a flaw in Doc Sidhe, it's that the novel's focus is slightly diluted; Doc is the title character while Harris is the protagonist, and Allston occasionally allows the point of view to slip briefly into various other players' heads. This sometimes makes the combat choreography a touch unwieldy, but on the flip side, it makes for stronger characterizations than usually found in Doc Savage's exploits.

Indeed, Allston has created both a skillful homage to pulp adventures and a refreshing twist on the subgenre. And he's left the way open for more adventures starring the redoubtable Doc Sidhe and his fearless band of sidekicks. One definitely hopes that another outing is in the works.

VOICES John Vornholt Dell 440-22057-2 $5.50

I admit I've been, at best, an erratic follower of the syndicated Babylon 5 television series. But whether one is a dedicated fan of the show, an occasional viewer, or a newcomer to the B5 universe, this first novel set in that world offers a breakneck adventure that fans of dark-future SF should find more than adequately dangerous for their tastes.

Writer John Vornholt has chosen a plot that builds smoothly on recurring elements of the series, then extends them into areas unlikely to be explored in the televised episodes. Thus the novel's major adversarial slot is filled by oily and dangerous Psi Corps investigator Bester, reluctantly assisted by civilian psi agent Harriman Gray. Vornholt effectively captures the genteel nastiness B5 watchers have seen Walter Koenig bring to Bester's character, and Gray's romantic interest in B5 second-in-command Susan Ivanova is likewise on target.

Center stage, though, goes to B5's resident telepath, Talia Winters, who finds herself cleverly framed for a bombing that nearly kills Bester and threatens to escalate a conflict on Mars into open warfare. In a frantic effort to clear her name, she flees the station and races to Earth itself, searching for the true culprit. Prickly B5 security chief Garibaldi doesn't believe the frame, but is forced by circumstances to go after her, and must accept Gray as a partner in the investigation.

The lengthy visit to Earth is crisply narrated and consistent with what viewers have picked up from the series, and Vornholt effectively balances Talia's flight with Garibaldi's pursuit. Once back on terra firma, both searchers rapidly discover unexpected dimensions to the conspiracy behind the attack, and before matters are resolved once and for all, the players must travel to Mars and reveal the truth behind a prior bombing.

The foray to Earth and the insights into Talia's character are both welcome adjuncts to B5's televised episodes, in which time and budget prevent journeying too far from the station itself. One might wish, in this first book-length adventure, that more of the show's large cast made noteworthy appearances; we really don't see much of the alien ambassadors or of station commander John Sheridan. What we do get, however, is entirely in character, and Vornholt gets in several good comic bits involving supporting personnel.

In general, though, the Babylon 5 universe is darker and less friendly than most of its cousins on the small screen, with shadowy enemies and multi-layered conspiracies an ever-present component of life in the interstellar community. It's an intriguing and welcome contrast, and it's a pleasure to add novels about B5's denizens to the SF lists.

NO EARTHLY SUNNE Margaret Ball Baen O-671-87633-3 $5.99

The spine says that Margaret Ball's latest novel is fantasy, which is no surprise in a novel featuring authentic Elizabethan music, the courts of Faerie, and a romance spanning four centuries. But it's also an odd sort of legitimate science fiction, because overlapping the magical elements is a thoughtful web of speculation involving the nature of time and reality.

We begin in 1594, with a country masque staged by one Wicked Kit Arundel. It's Kit's hope that the creation of a "perfect" music will unlock the secrets of ultimate knowledge, allowing complete understanding of the universe's workings. But what he unlocks instead are the gates of Faerie, whereupon the Queen of Faerie binds him to her service and returns to her own realm, taking Kit with her.

Cut to 1994, where we meet expert computer programmer Ellen Ainsley. Once a student and performer of Renaissance music, she's turned away from it after a series of unsettling experiences, but reluctantly returns to the subject when she and several friends are offered the chance at a trip to England for a special performance—a revival of a masque once staged by Wicked Kit Arundel.

There is, of course, more to the offer than is initially evident, and more to Ellen as well. Once Wicked Kit's beloved Eleanor, her musical abilities are an integral part of the magic capable of bridging the worlds. Kit himself appears before long, making a bid for freedom from the Queen's timeless court. But Ellen isn't certain of her own memories, Kit is unsettled to discover just how long he's been in exile, and the Faerie Queen's own plans might well bring time itself to a permanent standstill.

Ball brings the Elizabethan half of her tale a convincing sense of period and style, incorporating songs of the day (many quoted in full in a useful appendix) and a subplot laced with entirely credible court intrigue. Likewise, Ellen's computer expertise is portrayed with smooth plausibility, and proves unexpectedly relevant to the twin tasks of rescuing Kit and preserving mortal reality from Faerie's incursions. The blend of romance, suspense, and mistedged magic also is adept and astute.

That makes No Earthly Sunne a thoroughly successful tale, light without being unintelligent and literate without being pretentious. Those who enjoy Elizabethan adventures will find it a more than pleasant diversion, and those new to the period will find the novel an enjoyable introduction.

Recurring roles

Two titles from Bruce Coville top the tall stack of books worth noting this time out. The first is Bruce Coville's Book of Nightmares (Scholastic Apple, $3.50), fourth in his series of anthologies marketed for children but readable by anyone looking for a good scare. As usual, there's not a misfire anywhere in the book, but two stories stand out. Michael Mansfield's "Toll Call" makes a chilling point in a very short space, and Steven Prohaska's contestwinning "Halloween Party" is as polished and clever as any tale in the collection-no small achievement for an eighth grader matched with writers of Joe Lansdale's and Jane Yolen's caliber.

ALL GOOD GAMES SHOPS

Popular TSR authors Elaine Cunningham and R. A. Salvatore both have new books out; Cunningham's, The Unicorn Hunt (TSR, $3.95) is part of TSR's new young-adult fantasy line. As such, it's more traditionally plotted than Cunningham's two tales set in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® world, but Cunningham lends vivid enthusiasm to her story of a young man's search for unicorns, healing magic, and other things.

Less successful, on the whole, is The Sword of Bedwyr (Warner Aspect, $18.95). The combat sequences are detailed and brisk in solid Salvatore style, but for a book billed as high-energy swashbuckling, it's oddly flat and over-narrated. Techniques that work in recounting the often angst-ridden deeds of Drizzt Do'Urden are less effective in what should be a fastermoving yarn, and certain plot points seem too conveniently staged.

For more reliably lively adventure, Anne Logston has yet to disappoint. Dagger's Point (Ace, $4.99) continues the adventures of Jaellyn, niece to the notorious thief Shadow and a clever lass in her own right, this time embarking on a long and unpredictable trek in search of her father's people and the missing half of her own soul. Logston's craft gets smoother and more assured as she goes, and this outing adds further depth to what is becoming a large and intriguing fantasy world.

The High Queen (Del Rey, $5.99) completes Nancy McKenzie's duology about Arthur and Guinevere, and confirms what the first half of the saga promised. The two books together form a strong, readily accessible account of Arthur's life and reign, making a good introduction to modern Arthurian tales for the general reader. There are more sophisticated Arthurian chronicles, and more unusual ones, but few short of Rosemary Sutcliff are more smoothly told than this.

Moving toward the dark side of the fantasy lists, we find welcome new titles from P. N. Elrod and Barbara Hambly. Elrod's Death Masque (Ace, $4.99) continues the adventures of Colonial-era vampire Jonathan Barrett, although the scene shifts to England for this entry in the series. While little progress is made on Jonathan's chief personal quest, there are more than enough revelations on other fronts to keep things lively. Meanwhile, in 1920s Hollywood, actress Chrysanda Flamande has been chosen as the Bride of the Rat God (Del Rey, $5.99) in one of Hambly's darker tales to date. An ancient Chinese demon is loose in movie-land, and until it's stopped, neither Chrysanda nor any of her entourage will rest easily.

On the Star Trek front, works by K. W. Jeter and Melissa Scott are among recent highlights. Jeter's Warped (Pocket, $22) finds Deep Space 9 the target of a harrowing scheme involving addictive holosuite technology with dangerous side effects, while Scott's Proud Helios (Pocket, $5.50) has Sisko and his crew coping with pirates, some nasty and some merely roguish. The DS9 series continues to be the Trek franchise's single most reliable source of quality storytelling, with these latest two tales matching the standards set by previous volumes.

Under the Healing Sign (Ace, $4.99) is Nick O'Donohoe's sequel to last year's The Magic and the Healing. The storytelling skill and compelling characters are still there, and though the new book doesn't quite match the impact of the first, O'Donohoe is still one of the most thoughtful novelists in Ace's stable.

A big mess o' fun

Usually, I try to build around a particular theme when writing a role-playing game review column. (As do my fellow RPG reviewers in this magazine, I note.) Often, the comparisons among products this allows provide added insight into the individual products. And a theme gives an article a sense of identity and personality that it would not have otherwise.

But this time around, I can't afford to do a themed column. The products I want to talk about are far too disparate to fit under any one heading. So let's just consider this a multi-media barrage and plan on a return to the sane structure of a theme in my next column. I hope.

Were I to baldly tell you the premise of this game, you likely would say, "That'll never work." That was certainly how my friends reacted when I told them, and most of them have been employed in the game industry for years. But professionals that they are, they agreed to give the game a try, and the results were surprising. Be warned, then: What I'm about to tell you may sound ludicrous at first. But give me a chance, and you should end up convinced of the game's validity.

The THEATRIX game is a virtually diceless approach to role-playing, based upon the premise that in each scene of an adventure the GM not only sets ahead of time the goal for that scene, but also decides beforehand whether the PCs will succeed or fail at that goal. Much like ancient Greek tragedy, all that remains to be discovered during play is exactly how the characters go about getting to that preset end, and how well they succeed or how poorly they fail.

I warned you.

With that premise in mind, there isn't much need for dice. As a matter of fact, the only time they are ever called for in the game is when the GM—called the Director in this product—can't decide ahead of time exactly how difficult to make a particular task. But given the game's emphasis on Director pre-scripting, even that need isn't likely to arise often.

Now, before you get too riled up about lack of player ability to influence the course of a story, let me hasten to note that PCs can use a limited number of personal points called "Plot Points" to change the outcome of a particular event. The book gives an example of a spy story, for instance, in which a male PC is clubbed by a woman who the Director has decided makes the attack with some regret, but who needs to incapacitate the PC long enough to steal an item and escape. The player, however, decides to spend a Plot Point to activate his character's "Descriptor" of "Lady's Man," and the Director approves the expenditure because it seems dramatically appropriate, so the woman changes her mind at the last moment, remaining for a romantic interlude rather than taking the item and leaving. Of course, now the Director will have to revise the larger plot of the adventure to account for the change, but that's part of the enjoyment.

Most of the time, however, players simply feel their way through the unfolding story, using their characters' skills to discover how much or how little the odds are currently stacked against them. In a fantasy story, for instance, if the characters investigate a cave and discover an ancient dragon inside, clever skill use will get them out alive with the least amount of damage, but without dice rolls there is no chance of a lucky strike killing the thing. Instead, they will have to explore other scenes of the adventure to discover just what they need to do to overcome the threat

This approach to role-playing may be unusual, but it works. The fact of the matter is, playing the game is fun.

The THEATRIX game has more to recommend it to role-players. The tone of the writing throughout is applaudable, and the visual presentation-both layout and artis quite good. The text is well organized, with lots of aids for the reader, including a healthy number of clear examples, plus end-of-chapter summaries and glossaries. Given the unusual nature of what the game teaches, those last two are especially helpful. Furthermore, in keeping with its theatrical approach to role-playing, the product teaches a remarkable amount about scripting stories as if they were dramas. That information alone makes the book a valuable resource for game masters. Finally, the game includes a set of cardstock flowcharts to train a novice THEATRIX Director in how to relate the effects of the PCs' successes and failures. (Seldom is a result blatantly successful or transparently failed: such as attempting to start a car on a cold day, most require some careful handling and tenacity for final success, or cautious experimentation to become certain of failure without causing additional trouble.) Those sheets are extremely helpful when first running the game, though they quickly obsolesce themselves by making the adjudication process second nature for the game master.

Prospective Directors should be warned, however, that getting started in a THEA-TRIX campaign usually takes some time.

For one thing, the initial concepts are so unusual that most readers will do a fair amount of head scratching in the early chapters of the book before catching on. Even after the book has been digested, the work left to be done is considerable. While the game allows for role-playing in any genre, it does so by defining only the framework, leaving the specifics of composing skill lists and definitions, attribute ranges, and so on to the GM (though the creators plan to release genre-specific source books in the future). And, of course, you may have some trouble convincing players to give the game a tryespecially if you introduce it the way I have in this review.

In all, though, the THEATRIX game definitely is a good value. While I don't agree with its designers' claim that it is the next evolution in role-playing (it is still fun to play games with dice; and my players felt less mortal danger for their characters with prescripted scenes and without the element of luck), I whole-heartedly recommend it as both an entertaining change from the vagaries of dice and an admirable training course in the creation of dramatic adventures. Were I were to teach a college course in role-playing, this game would be required reading.

THE EMPIRE OF ELWOLF: RUNES & RIDDLES * book

378page, 5½" X 8½" novel Author: F. J. Carradine

Royal Fireworks Press First Avenue Unionville NY 10988

Normally, I avoid reviewing things I don't like. Personally, I'd much rather tell people about cool things than about things that honk. The fact of the matter is, I'm typically loaded down with enough things to review (and short enough on time) that it makes sense to concentrate on only the best of products.

But on occasion, I feel obligated to warn people away from something that might otherwise suck them in. I don't want the bad karma that comes from people spending their hard-earned money on an awful product because it looks interesting or because someone has been pushing it, when I could have warned them but didn't.

Which brings me to the Runes & Riddles novel. Sigh. Recently, another magazine published a relatively favorable review of this product. Though the review itself is sufficiently poorly written to undermine its own credibility (as one example, the reviewer says the book's first few chapters are "cumbersome to read" because they are "chalked [sic] full of adjectives and adverbs"; and what an image that conveys), I still feel an obligation to disagree with it publicly, in order to make perfectly clear that you would be much better off spending your seven dollars elsewhere.

Why am I reviewing the book in a games column? Because the book reviewer has not reviewed it, and in response, the book's author argued that the riddles included at the beginning of each chapter make it a resource for role-playing adventures. Consequently, each game reviewer got a copy too. Given the stew of things I'm including in this particular review, I figured it was now or never.

What's so bad about Runes & Riddles? Let's see. Where to start . . .

Well, for one thing, the riddles are really inane, and the poetry they're cast in is even worse. Consider the following example from the book's cover:

Silent as a mouse, Never needing a house, Clad in plate, Always late.

Literature it ain't. And this is one of the better pieces.

Then there's the quality of the text itself. The prologue has a fellow stabbed with a dirk, then "helplessly [sink] to the floor-a dagger tip protruding from his posterior:" Ouch. It's bad enough to have one protrude from your back (which I can only assume was the author's intention); to have one protrude from your fanny must be exceptionally painful. The rest of the text abounds with such careless or ignorant misuse of the English language (one woman archer in the book can poke a goblin's eye out from a hundred paces away-what a reach!) married to an equal mix of triteness on one hand and ludicrously overblown verbiage on the other. Characters in this book whirl dramatically in preparation for an exit, then scamper down the hall. They smile their words, or crackle them (yes, "crackle"), or groan them, or propose them, or inject them, or even step into the conversation, rather than simply speaking. They pound their fists against wagons in frustration. They have silly names like Blak, and Crimbor, and the Ewtar goblins of north Rabivor, and (my personal favorite) King Blasteem Baltamax. (Okay, Okay. Taken alone, any one of these names might work-though I think "Blasteem Baltamax" is ridiculous no matter what-but real names arise out of history, culture, and language, which means that taken all together, they look and sound like they spring from the world to which they belong. Fantasy names should follow the same model, rather than seeming to pop willy-nilly from some random syllable computer program.)

The one good thing about the book is that you can open it to nearly any page, begin reading, and—within a paragraph or two—be driven to groans of disbelief or gales of laughter. As unintentional comedy, it is great.

And that is sad. It's sad because a living person put his heart into writing this stuff, and now he has to read this terribly negative review. I'm sorry to be the bearer of bad tidings, but it's time for a reality check. The reality is that Runes & Riddles is awful.

Black Dog Game Factory $: 780 Park North Blvd., Suite 100 Clarkston GA 30021

Fair warning: If the HOL game were a movie, it would be rated R for adult language, graphic violence, and sheer, overthe-edge insanity. This book is definitely not for kids. (As a matter of fact, while White Wolf Game Studio—a company with a reputation for mature themes in its products—currently owns the rights to publish the HOL game, it is releasing it under a new, even more mature imprint, Black Dog Game Factory.) But if you aren't offended by a bit of foul language, grue, and irreverent humor, then the HOL game may be just your cup of tea.

The premise of the game is that in the distant future there is a garbage/prison planet far, far from the rest of the galaxy, a world where undesirable individuals are dumped. The very letters "HOL" stand for "Human Occupied Landfill." In the HOL game, players take on the role of one of 10 pregenerated characters trapped on this horrible world. That's right, you have to play one of the characters in the bookguys like Eugene Spinkler (geek gamer), Captain Wacky (whose special abilities are "megayodel" and "can turn tongue upside down"), and "The man with no NAM" (complete with pot-belly stove lid armor) but it really doesn't matter that you can't design your own, because I doubt that anyone plays this game anyway. Few people in all creation are weird enough to serve as a "Holmeister" (game master), and besides, the real point of the HOL game is

The HOL game is a shockingly, breath-takingly hilarious read. Like some deranged underground comic book, the game is entirely hand written, which causes the text to blend with the artwork in ways that normally typeset products do not. The resulting loose visual effect matches perfectly with the darkly wacky content of that text. In a way, reading this game is like perusing some demented game master's notebook, complete with doodled arrows to important points, blotted-out errors, and marginal illos crammed in hither and yon.

Let's consider a few examples of text, beginning with the description of a skill that most games would call something like "fencing," or "bladed combat," or even the prosaic "sword." In the HOL game, this skill is called "Making sharp things go thru soft things that scream and bleed," and its description runs exactly as follows (errors and all): "In most cases, theres no art to the deadly games of sword and knife play. Just push it in and pull it out. Reapeat til dead." Other skills get the same sort of treatment, but you get the idea. One of my favorite things about the game is the fact that weapons are rated by both damage and "anguish factor." The "Anguish Factor Equivalencies" chart is a hoot. There we learn that anguish factor 1 is equivalent to "Stapling your finger," 2 to "Ripping your toenail on a brick," 9 to "Folding your elbow the wrong way," and so on. My personal favorite is 15, "Being caught in the gears of a ferris wheel."

While these few examples of text may serve to whet your appetite, I can't do justice in this column to the sheer weight of lunacy that is this book taken in total. The designers poke merciless fun at gamers, the hobby in general, related hobbies, other games (I love the jumpslugs entry, guys), corporate America, and even themselves. (After all, they're related to all those other entries in one way or another.)

Is there an actual game here? Yes. But I haven't played it yet; I'm still laughing my way through the book. As I said earlier, I hardly think the game's the point. However, if you are lunatic enough to run adventures on a world where-among other things-robot cameras attach themselves to PCs' heads to broadcast their adventures back to the galactic core but punish offensive sights by exploding, which means-among other things-no potty breaks for the afflicted characters, then you will find sufficient rules in the book to allow you to run those adventures. Besides, the text repeatedly encourages Holmeisters to make things up as they go, and to cheat indiscriminately.

I will warn one more time, though, that there is much in this book to offend those who find profanity, vulgarity, and black humor offensive. The HOL game is not for everyone.

But I have to admit that I find it thoroughly enjoyable.

As I said, this month's column visits terrain not normally stopped at in this portion of the magazine. First a novel, and now a computer game. But as an indirect result of my guest shot at the "Eye of the Monitor" in DRAGON® Magazine issue #214, I came across this product, and it appeals to my role-playing side sufficiently for me to want to tell you about it.

In this game, you play the role, primarily, of the Crimson Tape, a stalwart superhero with the power to create organizational charts and graphs, and leader of the not-soterribly-impressive Superhero League of Hoboken, New Jersey, in a comical yet deadly post-apocalyptic setting. As the opening screen of the game says, "The future ain't what it used to be." By visiting the league's lunch room, you can add other members to your party, heroes such as Tropical Oil Man, whose power raises the cholesterol level of opponents, and Madame Pepperoni, who can see the toppings on a pizza through the very box! (Granted, that power is helpful when one of the toppings is dynamite.) Each hero comes equipped with wondrous weapons (such as Zaniac's sharpened toothpick, or the Caped Cods slinky of death) and protective gear (from King Midas' deflector crown to Toastbuster's smart gloves), with even sillier and more powerful items to be found during missions.

Missions are what the game revolves around. The league begins with five missions to perform: at the initial level of play you must defuse a limburger bomb hidden in the trunk of an abandoned car, drive off a flock of rabid sheep terrorizing a village, fix the computer of a faltering religious sect (they've a magnet too close to the monitor), keep a warehouse full of jalapeno peppers from polluting the water table, and finally defeat a plot by the evil Doctor Entropy to dominate the world with his mind-control ray. Success at all of them means that the league is promoted and given a new set of five missions, as well as a gift of money, and likely the addition of another superhero come to share in your growing fame. While traveling across the map to the site of each mission (and secondary sites along the way, to gain items necessary for completion), your band of heroes encounters all sorts of strange, bio-mechanical, mutant nasties, creatures such as McMutant, who may squirt you with a damaging special sauce, Steroid Man, or the Samurai Welder. Defeating these foes lends your characters experience, translating into improved abilities in both combat and use of secondary super powers.

The silliness of these examples matches well the jolly nonsense of the mission solutions, but that is exactly what is so much fun about the game. You are driven to think creatively in order to defeat the plots, and the toughness of the combats along the way, as well as the applaudable graphics (a good blend of realistic detail, humorous imagery, and engaging animation), combine to produce entertaining play.

The primary thread that holds the overall adventure together is the recurring threat of Dr. Entropy. Having been left for dead in a junkyard years before, the fellow was rescued by a deranged repair robot, who used nearby parts in rebuilding him. As a consequence, Dr. Entropy now looks like a demented jack-in-the-box, which explains his mad desire to revenge himself upon the world at large. But the adventure also is unified by the fact that items encountered early in play become important to solving later missions. The end result is a game that allows you to play for a while, accomplish a minor goal, get back to your real life, and return to its zanv lure later.

Some people may find a few aspects of the game tasteless: In order to solve one mission, for instance, you absolutely have to dicker with the madam of a brothel. But these elements are minor-much less central than in other of Virgin's products, such as the SPELLCASTING 101: SORCER-ERS GET ALL THE GIRLS* game.

In all, then, THE SUPERHERO LEAGUE OF HOBOKEN computer game provides quite a bit of entertainment. Its unique characters, captivating missions, overarching story line, and engaging details of play result in a satisfying sense of role-playing. I wouldn't skip an RPG session to play it, but it sure makes satisfying filler for the times in between.

I was 20 years old when Star Wars first hit the big screen. Prior to that time, science-fiction and fantasy were pretty much treated seriously only in books; movies of those genres were typically cheesy fair. There was the occasional exception, of course-as in the case of The Day the Earth Stood Still-but society at large just didn't seem interested in such fanciful things, and it showed. Consequently, I remember sitting in awe as Star Wars opened and a star destroyer slid endlessly across the top of the screen, firing at the fleeing rebel transport; I remember being filled with emotion at the haunting double sunset of Tatooine as Luke scanned the horizon for the runaway R2D2. In these scenes and others, the film touched all the wonder of my boyhood spent in other worlds through the magic of books.

A few years later, a friend introduced me to the DUNGEONS & DRAGONS® game, and shortly thereafter to the AD&D® game. Again I felt the awesome wonder of being transported back to fantastic worlds I had grown up in. In a heartbeat, I was hooked, my fate as a gamer (and later, as a game designer) was sealed.

As the years have passed, I have found many movies and games enjoyable. But only a few have satisfied in such a visceral way. As a fan of the movie, I was thrilled to find West End Games' STAR WARS* game (especially the first edition) just as much a classic. Its mechanics are so well wedded to the setting that they become virtually invisible during play, something that relatively few games can claim. Some years earlier, I was introduced to Chaosium's CALL OF CTHULHU* (CoC) game through the pages of the nowdefunct SPACE GAMER* magazine, and again, I was hooked. The setting is so well envisioned, and the game mechanics reflect it so smoothly, that the game has become a milestone by which others are measured.

I hope it won't sound audacious for me to say that I think the CoC RPG finds its match in the WHISPERING VAULT* game. While the original, pre-press, "Black Book" edition of the WHISPERING VAULT game (reviewed in DRAGON® MAGAZINE #208) was a bit rough around the edges, it tantalized with its unique vision of horror and its impressive grasp of effective and inventive game mechanics. I am happy to say that the subsequent full version of the game delivers on the promise of that original book. This game touches in me that same deep sense of awe that the AD&D, STAR WARS, and CoC games have. I cannot give any higher a recommendation than that.

Nonetheless, "You always hurt the ones you love." It has something to do with knowing them better than anyone else, and with wanting them to excel. In the paragraphs that follow, then, as a true aficionado of the game, I take pains to point out both its strengths and weaknesses. Just remember that any "complaints" I make in the process are not evidence of any dissatisfaction on my part, but rather are intended to make your use of the game as satisfying as possible.

In the WHISPERING VAULT game, players take the role of characters who were once human, but whose investigations into the supernatural have led them to transcend the flesh and become other-worldly guardians of reality. In the transition from flesh to "essence," their most elemental nature is revealed: I've run adventures for a Native American turned thunderbird spirit, a flame-headed Puritan preacher from colonial Salem, a 1970s smiley face sphere of gold with a razor-sharp mohawk, a shadowy 1930s detective who appears only in black and white, and the walking corpse of a Victorian alchemist, just to name a few; and I've played as PCs a werewolf/motorcycle "centaur," and a human "centipede" made of six murdered bodies merged end to end. (The monsters these characters fight are even more terrifying.)

Character creation is simplicity itself. The first, and hardest, step is simply envisioning the central concept for your character. You needn't know anything about the game mechanics at this point. As a matter of fact, I've begun adventure after adventure at conventions by simply describing a few previous character concepts and then asking the players for their ideas. Invariably, as soon as one player begins describing something, it spurs the others to creativity, and within minutes everyone is ready to begin translating their description into game mechanics.

That concept-to-mechanics process is extremely easy. Each player begins by dividing 22 points among four basic attributes, as fitting the character's description. (The number of points spent in each determines how many six-sided dice you roll when using that attribute during the game. As in playing the YAHTZEE* game, you look for the highest total of matched numbers when making a roll. Spending a point of "karma"-characters start with 5-lets you reroll any number of the dice, as well, also as in the YAHTZEE game.)

Subsequent character creation steps are just as simple, and there are only a handful, each flowing naturally from the initial character concept. (For more details, see the aforementioned review of the "Black Book" edition.) Finally, players each envision the other-worldly realm their character creates in which to spend time between adventures. As an extension of the character, the realm provides a haven whose nature matches the character's completely. For instance, the aforementioned Victorian alchemist occupied a realm that incorporated an English sitting room/alchemical laboratory into the interior of a crypt, in the middle of a run-down cemetery. His servitors were corpses that would claw their way up from their graves when he needed tea served, or suchlike. The thunderbird spirit dwelt in a deep cloud atop a mountain and was served by the spirits of forest creatures.

Adventures in the game are largely formulaic: Basically, the characters are summoned back to the realm of flesh by some mortal or another in dire need; they investigate to determine just how the realm is being invaded and corrupted (usually the invader is a renegade "god" whose lust for its own creation leads it to invade, which inevitably results in the corruption of that creation); the PCs supernaturally "mend" the corruption and bind the renegade, then haul it back to the realm of essence, to toss it into the Whispering Vault, an otherworldly prison for 'gods" who have fallen. This formulaic nature is great for providing structure for one-time adventures, but it begins to feel confining to most players in a campaign. To be fair, I must point out that the game has some wonderful suggestions for opening up that structure (I really want to run a campaign of Watchers, for instance, who maintain a stronghold in a particular time and place of the fleshly realm, where they act as location-specific guardians, with an occasional jaunt to another time and place when someone's need is truly great), but most players seem to get hung up on the default structure. Prospective GMs should be prepared for this and take steps to deflate the problem before it arises.

The book's presentation is excellent, nearly flawless (except for some typos, such as virtually no apostrophes). The attitude projected by both text and art is uniformly dark, brooding, and extremely strange. The end result is a virtually seamless presentation of Nystul's vision of horror (except for Talon, a sample PC at the very back of the book, whose premise and art I didn't think fit the rest in the original book, and who seems even more out of place in this version; but hey, that's only one character sheet). And that unique vision is both shockingly strange and yet universal in scope.

Some potential buyers might be put off by the price of the game relative to the thickness of the book. Don't let this be you. This product is pure, distilled horror, with some of the most concise yet effective mechanics ever published; its relative slimness simply means that you'll digest the game more quickly initially, and reference it more easily during play. Just because White Wolfs horror games are padded with meandering angst (come on, admit it, we all know it's true, and I run a weekly VAMPIRE* game campaign), that doesn't mean all horror has to be presented that way. Give the WHISPERING VAULT game a try, and you'll see what I mean.

This first supplement for the WHISPER-ING VAULT RPG is an excellent addition to the game's mythos. It contains expanded material about the renegades that the PCs hunt, including new information concerning their powers and lairs, plus further details of the minions that serve them, as well as numerous adventure hooks and a 19-page adventure.

The art and text carry on the tradition of the original game, resulting in another book that is refreshingly concise, and just as darkly horrific. While you certainly don't need the DANGEROUS PREY book to play the WHISPERING VAULT game, the material it provides will definitely enhance a campaign. I highly recommend it.

Short & sweet

THE GREAT DALMUTI game* by Richard Garfield. Wizards of the Coast, PO. Box 707, Renton WA 98057-0707, $7.95.

For those who might be wondering, this card game has absolutely nothing to do with the MAGIC: THE GATHERING* game. Unlike MTG, it isn't collectible-from four to eight players play right out of the single box. And, truth be told, unlike MTG, it isn't original: Many players will recognize it as a slight variant of another game played with a regular deck of playing cards, under the name of "Jerk," "Fool," or (from an Australian friend) "Presidents and [insert pluralized name of a lower sphincter here]," or somesuch. But, regardless of its origins, the game is fun. Players try to empty their hands of cards as quickly as possible by discarding matching sets of cards with increasingly lower face values. If the lead player discards three nines, for instance, the next player has to discard three matching cards numbered eight or lower, and so on around the table. Players who can't discard must pass. Assuming a five-player game, the first player to run out of cards becomes the Greater Dalmuti for the next hand; the second becomes the Lesser Dalmuti, the third the Merchant, the fourth the Lesser Peon, and the fifth the Greater Peon. (Larger groups result in more merchants.) At the beginning of each hand, the Dalmutis each give a lousy card or two to their respective Peons (one for the Lesser Dalmuti and two for the Greater), and the Peons have to give their best card or cards in exchange.

Unless you use an optional victory-point rule, there is no fixed end to the game. Play just continues from hand to hand, with players trying to hold the best positions for as long as possible. New players can join the game between hands by entering the merchant ranks.

People who purchase this game expecting another Garfield masterpiece are likely to be disappointed, especially if they've played a version of it before with regular playing cards. But the art is good; the package is nice; the rules are well written; and play is enjoyable.

BATTLEBOTS* game (by Adam Loper and Peter Spahos, Snarling Badger Games, PO. Box 1744, Oshkosh WI 54902-1744, $10.95).

Reminiscent in many ways of the old MELEE\* and WIZARD\* games from Metagaming, the BATTLEBOTS game allows players to custom-design fighters and have them battle to the death on a hex-grid arena map. But in this case, the fighters are robots, and the rules are a bit simpler than those earlier games, while still allowing quite a bit of strategy in both construction and use of the combatants. The price of the game seems a bit steep considering the quality of the components: The game comes in a CD jewel case, and consists of a 24-page, 41/2" X 5" rules book, a folded  $8\frac{1}{4}$ " X  $9\frac{1}{2}$ " map sheet, several character sheets, six fold-over figures, and two tiny dice. All of the paper components are in simple black and white, with the exception of the figures, which are black on six different colors. While the figures in particular look chintzy, the fact that they stand up does elevate them above flat counters (pun intended), which I think a good decision on the designers' part. The rules are nicely designed and clearly written; there are no "iffy" areas for debate during play. They make me itch to build a 3-D arena and paint up some robots for play at conventions. If you judge a product by the component materials, this one will probably disappoint you. But if you don't mind forking over \$11 for sheer play value, I definitely recommend this game.

VAMPIRE: THE MASQUERADE*: MINI BLOOD POINTS* (Shield Games, PO. Box 211053, Columbus OH 43221, $6.00).

If you play the JYHAD* game (Hi. I'm Lester, and I'm a Jyhadaholic.), this is a wonderfully useful item to have. It consists of 30 small red glass beads and five black ones to keep track of your blood expenditure (the blacks count as five blood each), together with a miniature IV transfusion bag to carry them in. The bag makes a great "edge" token, fully in keeping with the spirit of the game (and because its tubing is fastened in a circle, the truly pretentious can wear it as a sort of charm bracelet). It also can carry the beads, though they're a bit difficult to get into it, and they have a tendency to spill out the mouth if you're not careful. Fortunately the package includes a resealable plastic bag for back-up.

TSR publishes "lost" GREYHAWK® manuscript electronically

TSR, Inc., uploaded its first fully electronic game release to AOL in March; Ivid the Undying for the WORLD OF GREYHAWK® setting is available in the download area of TSR Online. Designed by Carl Sargent and previewed in DRAGON® Magazine issues #204, 206, and 208, Ivid covers the horrors, politics, characters, and unique monsters of the Great Kingdom of Aerdy, a region plunged into civil war and mayhem during the Greyhawk Wars. If published conventionally, it would run to almost 200 pages. Though the format does not support maps and artwork, the Great Kingdom can be used in any high-level GREYHAWK campaign.

WotC buys Andon

In the past two years, Wizards of the Coast has gobbled up chunks of White Wolf (the ARS MAGICA* game), Nightfall Games (the SLA INDUSTRIES* game), Atlas Games (the TALISLANTA* game, for a while), and most of Pagan Press (The Unspeakable Oath). Now they have added Andon Unlimited to their list of trophies for a "more than adequate" sum. Andon, run by Gary Smith, runs several major conventions every year, including Three Rivers Con in Pittsburgh, Cruisecon in the Caribbean, Andcon in Toledo, Ohio, the ORIGINS* convention in Philadelphia, and the GAMA Trade Show in New Orleans. Smith plans on moving to Renton, Wash., by April; He has plans to add one more staffer soon, and looks forward to working closely with the Duelist Convocation team. Andon will retain a large degree of independence.

Pariah on Crusade

Pariah Press has a new fantasy role-playing game in the works (as we mentioned in issue #216) and, not surprisingly, it's going to be very different. What that means is anyone's guess, but Pariah headman Mike Nystul says, "It's a big change of pace for us." The characters are called Changelings and have mysterious supernatural abilities. After the war of the gods, the Changelings form an order of knights during the twilight of the gods—a strange time indeed. Even the god of death is dead, and undead war machines walk the land.

This is the setting of the fantasy game called CRUSADE*, which will be available late this year. A preview edition that includes everything needed to play, but describing only a limited portion of the world setting is expected to be ready for the GEN CON® Game Fair. However, some portions of the game will be available only in the preview version. In addition, some details of the setting will be previewed on America Online in the Online Gaming Forum (keyword: OGF), in the Game Company Support folder.

In the four years that I've been playing the AD&D® game, several house interpretations of the rules have had to be argued out. But recently in a campaign where I am a player, two rules have been interpreted in such a fashion that I feel obligated to ask if anyone else in the gaming community plays these rules this way.

First, the current DM of our game has ruled that a mage can cast whatever spell he desires. (Of course, it has to be in his spellbook and it must fit within the amount of spells per level he can cast per day.) The mage player in the group obviously has no problem with this, but the clerics do. The PHB states that clerics and mages cast spells the same way; therefore, the priests argue that they should not have to state the spells that they have prepared to cast. Advice, anyone?

Second, my character is a dual-classed thief/fighter. She was advancing as a thief when something strange happened at 11th level. She got dull, boring, a nuisance to play, a snooze a minute . . . you get the point. The only thing the character could do well was sneak around and backstab with her sunblade. So I went to my DM and asked if I could switch back to advancing as a fighter. He said I could, but then mentioned that I'd need nearly a million XP to be able to use my thieving abilities again. After much talking, he has allowed me only to need to surpass the amount of XP not levels as a fighter. I do realize that this situation is disregarding two of the rules concerning dual-classism, but it seems more reasonable.

I wrote this hoping some experienced GMs out there could give me some advice. I am a novice GM who can't seem to figure out what the PCs in foreign worlds/areas should know and easily be able to figure out.

I have tried everything from "You are in a dark forest totally unfamiliar to you" to "You are 50 miles west of Corvia, in Darkon, which is a domain in Ravenloft (here's a map) ruled by . . . " and have yet to find a happy medium.

So now I turn to the ranks of veteran GMs, who hopefully can give me a few techniques and insights to my problem.

I have been keeping track of the role-playing vs. hack & slash arguments featured in DRAGON Magazine for the past several months. In those past issues, many a person has written in to try to convince the gaming world that one aspect is better. But it seems to me that most, if not all, of these combatants have forgotten one small thing: It is called role-playing, is it not? And combat is a part of the role-playing, is it not? What players and DMs have to do is strive to find a happy mix of the two.

I have played and ran campaigns set in each of these aspects. My 11 years of gaming experience have taught me that one is not better than the other. Playing only one style tends to make the game boring, predictable, and easy, i.e., not a lot of fun.

Now, some loyal role-players and some equally loyal hack & slashers are probably going to disagree and tell me to go to the Abyss for spouting such rhetoric.

An RPG is a game in which the player takes on a role of a character (much like an actor or actress) and imagines to be living and interacting in a fantasy world. To survive in this world, the character must be proficient in both the ways of war and the ways of the mind. An RPG is meant to combine all of these elements into one, thus making the game enjoyable and fun to play. Some players may want to just roll the dice, jot down some stats, and go kick some butt, in turn making their characters one-dimensional and bent on obtaining only one goal: money. Some players, on the other hand, may want to spend countless hours forming their characters' background, personality, goals, and ambitions. Then they roll the dice, jot down the stats, and go kick some butt, making their characters boring, boorish, and kinda lazy.

It seems that some players choose only one aspect and go overboard with it. Personally, I do not wish to play with someone whose cut-and-dried character has no name, no identity, no individualism, and only wants to go out and kill every single solitary living thing in sight. Nor do I wish to game with someone who overacts, worries about what the character is wearing, and sits down to ponder the ways of existence when that rather large, meanlooking red dragon decides that the party would make a rather pleasant addition to its evening meal.

In my opinion, the best campaign to game in is one in which both aspects are met. Player characters have names, faces, histories, and personalities, and the players get a chance to role-play. And by the same token, they also get to take part in great and epic quests, gain fame, get rich, and, of course, kick butt.

Without one, the other is useless. Together they make the game fun to play. Apart, they make it out to be old maid.

Issue #208 was the first DRAGON Magazine I have bought in almost 10 years. I was kind of surprised it was still around.

I would like to respond to Rick Underwood's letter in that issue regarding critical hits. I agree with his statement regarding critical hits adding a dimension of risk to higher level parties, a chance to win for lower-level parties and the element of humor into an AD&D game. I also used to use the system from DRAGON issue #39, but decided that it was too specific and often had unreasonable results, such as a "helmet slips" for a character who didn't wear a helmet. In turn, I use a system where the chance of scoring a critical hit or fumbling is a percentage chance equal to the number that was rolled higher or lower than the number needed to hit. This system was perfected by a friend of mine who ran an excellent campaign until last year, when the concerns of the real world negated his time to play or run a game. Once a critical hit or fumble has been scored, I use a d8/d12 combined roll to determine results. The results get more drastic as one approaches the extremes in the range of die rolls. The idea behind this came from the encounter generation system presented in the original AD&D game's Monster Manual II. The results are generic enough so that a good DM can tailor critical hit/fumble results to a specific situation and circumstance without violating any rules.

On a more personal note. I've played the AD&D game for 13 years now. I don't have time to be a DM any more, but I play in a weekly game run by a DM who's been gaming since the age of disco. I have all the original game stuff, including dozens of modules in pristine condition. Recently I went into a game store in my home town. I hadn't purchased any AD&D game materials for several years and hadn't been in a game store in a long time. I saw an original edition Monster Manual priced at $35.00! I was quite surprised. It seems that one of my favorite hobbies has passed me by. I haven't kept in touch with what's going on. I never considered myself a "veteran" gamer, but judging from other people I've met I guess I am. I used to have a couple of DRAGON issues numbered in the 50s and 60s hanging around in a battered cardboard box in some closet. I've been told they could be quite valuable. How strange! Also, while I was idling I found that lead miniatures have become almost impossible to find. They're almost all "handcrafted in pewter" and cost an arm and a leg. I saw orcish and elvish miniatures armed with laser guns. I saw games and gaming concepts that seemed too far out in left field to be viable, yet someone must be buying them. I think I'm too far behind to catch up with the gaming world. I'll just keep playing the AD&D game with my thirty-something friends when our real lives allow us to, using lead miniatures and out-of-print material bought a decade and a half ago.

I am writing in response to Philip Toomey's letter in DRAGON issue #210, regarding the parry maneuver. In his letter, he proposed that in order to successfully parry an incoming attack, the defender must roll higher on a d20 than his foe's attack roll. While this is an effective solution to the problem of better armor lessening your foe's chance to parry, I would like to share my own rule.

In my campaign, when parrying an attack, players roll to hit their opponent's modified THAC0, minus ten. Therefore, in order to parry the attack of a lst-level fighter (THAC0 20), one needs to hit AC 10, unless the fighter has strength or specialization bonuses. To parry a blow from a 9th-level fighter with a strength of 18/25 who is attacking with his specialized weapon, a +2 long sword (modified 8 THAC0), one would need to hit AC -2 (8 THAC0 minus 10).

This system, in my view, works better than that of using a foe's normal AC to determine success of parries. A skilled swordsman wearing no armor should have a much better chance to bypass a foe's defenses than an unskilled lackey in field plate.

Over the last few years, I've noticed a lot of assumptions about role-playing and role-playing games seem to have been thrown out the window. No longer are players limited to playing only the good guys-"boy scouts" as some call them. In the wake of such games as White Wolfs VAMPIRE* and Hero Games' DARK CHAM-PIONS* setting, a lot of discussion about dark game or mature RPGs has taken place. To me, darkness in an RPG refers to the game's setting. Consider some of the RPGs that have used the word dark in their titles or descriptions: the entire subgenre of "dark future" RPGs (the various cyberpunk games are the best examples), DARK CHAMPIONS setting, and GDW's DARK CONSPIRACY * game, among others. The newest of these, the DARK CHAMPIONS setting, was released in 1993. As you can see, dark isn't a new concept to this industry. All these games share a grim, desperate campaign environment.

However, the type of actions that the PCs in these games take, the kind of missions they accept, and the variety of deeds they perform all tend to be quite similar to the actions, missions, and deeds characters in other RPGs take. You can call the mission a corporate extraction in a darkfuture game, but how are the PCs' mission goals (and the actions they take to achieve those goals) different from the goals of rescuing the princess held captive in the evil wizard's tower in a high-fantasy RPG? All that's different is the setting.

Mature games are defined instead by their plots. The actions taken by the PCs are based on the decisions the players make for their characters. In a mature game, these decisions are much more complex than in other RPGs. The world is not black and white; there are an infinite number of shades of gray-just as in real life. Mature games carry with them stories that contain multiple choices with multiple outcomes. Further, each of these options carries with it consequences that the PCs will have to deal with. What I'm not talking about when referring to mature subject matter is hack & slash gaming. Don't think that you're playing a mature game just because there are graphic levels of violence or sex in your campaign. I'm talking about role-playing here, not indulging in some festival of lust and gore and calling that mature. Mature games require complex decision-making by the game's players.

It is, of course, possible to play a mature game in an immature fashion (hacking and slashing, as mentioned above), just as it's possible to run a mature campaign using almost any RPG rules system. It's up to you and your group. Play the game that's fun for you; it is your campaign, after all. Still, I wonder what the other readers of this magazine think about the trend of these RPGs.

Stephen Carter Cleveland OH Enough is enough! For too long I have perused the pages of the "Forum" to be regaled time and again with the assorted merits, deficiencies, playability, and—that ultimate bugaboo of players, game masters and game designers alike—game balance of the various AD&D game player classes and races.

I understand that such debates often provide the same warm glow one gets when arguing the results of the latest college football poll with one's coworkers and that these arguments are basically a harmless diversion. Unfortunately, too many of these letters end with the assumption that the game is in dire need of drastic rule changes lest the AD&D game implode due to some grievous and unjust imbalance created by the powers (or lack thereof) of a particular character class or race.

Such wholesale tampering is quite unnecessary. The AD&D game is over 10 years old and shows no signs of such imminent destruction. It matters not one whit whether the priest is more powerful than the fighter who is tougher than the wizard who far outclasses the lowly thief (or any other pecking order to which you might subscribe). Any differences are relatively minor, and how you play your character is far more important than any advantages or deficiencies, real or perceived, that are inherent to the class.

Who really cares if one character type is more powerful than another? Does that mean that the lesser archetypes are doomed to extinction because no one will play them? I hardly think so. If 15 years of gaming has taught me anything (other than how to survive on a meager diet of soda pop and pretzels), it is that the style of play far outweighs the substance. Iand many others, I am certain-have a lot of fun playing the different classes and races, even those combinations some gamers consider weak or unplayable. As far as I'm concerned, the challenge to good play that such "unplayable" characters present just adds to my enjoyment of the Level playing fields rarely exist in reality; why should they be more common in fantasy? If the campaign or game rules dictate that wizards are more powerful than elven fighter/priests, so be it. Why anyone would want to play the "inferior" elf is probably incomprehensible to a power gamer, but they are missing out on much of the fun and variety that the AD&D game has to offer.

In issue #210, Adam Bickford declared the cleric class "the ultimate Monty Haul incarnate," while Melody Alder decided in the same issue that it "needs to be expanded." Are both correct? Yes. But are changes to the rules for clerics necessary? No. It seems to me that by adjusting the place of priests in AD&D game society, Melody can get the role-playing options she's looking for at the same time the cleric advantages that Adam noticed can be justified.

The trouble with clerics is that it's so easy to pigeonhole them in a campaign. As the more defensive counterpart to wizards, it's easy to look upon them as pacifistic healers whose "spell capabilities . . . tend to set them in the backdrop of the campaign." That, despite all the attention they have gotten in recent issues of DRAGON Magazine, is exactly where they are supposed to be. Clerics (and specialty priests) are representatives of the Powers that the populations they serve worship. They have to be "mothering" characters, because they tend to be too busy minding the troubles of commoners to become selfinvolved the way non-priest PCs can. Constantly having to aid PCs and NPCs is part of the job of being a priest.

What Melody and her group should realize, however, is that AD&D game clerics are much more than "walking bandages." As Adam pointed out, they are very versatile characters to play (and can be even more so in the case of specialized priests, who, in certain incarnations, gain weapon choices, thief abilities, and wizard spells normally the sole province of the other classes). The reason for the "Monty Haulism" of the class is a simple one.

Consider that in a society where magic exists, greater numbers of that society's members will become priests than in our own world because the presence of magic would confirm the assumption upon which all religious thought is based, that there is more to life than our senses and sciences can perceive. In such a society, priests would naturally gain more influence than wizards. That is because while wizards dabble with the mysterious energies that their spells could tap, hoping to turn their Art into a rational Science, priests would gain the benefits of spells without having to examine their source, i.e., god(s). They could concentrate on serving the needs of their communities or getting involved in secular politics, at the same time they kept watch on the experiments of mages.

That's where general-purpose clerics come in: They are fighting priests responsible for maintaining the status quo between their religion, the secular institutions of the warrior and rogue classes, and the sometimes "blasphemous" practices of the wizard class. They are such advantage-laden characters, Adam, because their training, adaptive mindset, and divine patronage are needed to make them better able to deal with the machinations of the other class types simultaneously. Their spells are repetitive, Melody, because, for the most part, higher-level spells are meant to reflect priests' increased capacity to deal with the same problems they faced at lower level in service to the narrowly focused concerns of their patron Power(s).

More than any other character type, how a priest develops and matures as a PC depends on how well developed her environment is. Cleric characters can grow in many ways. They may find themselves involved in a power struggle between their orders and an influential thieves guild, noble, or necromancer. (Imagine trying to do that without alienating PC cohorts employed by the above.) They may have to re-win their community's trust in them after an unstoppable event occurs. They may have to struggle to maintain their influence in a community when rival or opposing clerics or specialty priests set up in the area. They would most definitely have to aid commoners in their care against monsters, humanoids, and natural disasters. Imagine trying to do any of this while dealing with your order's internal bickering. Or imagine trying to do any of that while acting as a living embodiment of the ideals that your religion preaches to the masses. The cleric is a well-balanced "wizard/warrior" class with many growth opportunities in any detailed campaign world. You've just got to have a mission.

One and one can make six!

This month, parts of the column are going to be done just a little differently. Everything you see now is modular, from closet organizers to Clan battlemechs, and this is not necessarily a bad thing. Marketing hobby items this way gives you, the consumer, a large number of different choices and ultimately saves you money. For a reviewer, modular products are hard to fit into most existing column formats. I chose to build an item and then list the products used, their stock numbers, and prices as I described each piece. In these "modular reviews," the rating will be con tained throughout the piece rather than in the item header as usually is the case.

I also want to thank Chris Foster for his usual excellent paint job on the Minotaurs Not only will they look good in the column, but the Chaos army has gained a major unit.

Geo-Hex

2126 N. Lewis Portland OR 97227

Miniature games are never quite right unless you use scenery. The problem with most scenery, especially buildings and trees, is that you are locked into one size and shape. This means that the buildings are the same game after game and eventually your troops start asking whether they have fought in this "burg" before. Geo-Hex has introduced modular construction to the 6 mm range of games, and that means that a board can be ever-changing.

You start with a base unit (MT33a; $6.50) and add a Hospital Helipad (MT-35, Alternative top with Landing Pad; $6.50). This now provides you with an octagon-shaped hospital, three stories tall with a 2" X 2" base. If you with to expand the Hospital, add a MT-39 Ground Level Extension ($6.50 each). You how have a 4" X 2" city block, complete with sidewalks, for under $20.00. The base has inset windows, multidoor entrances, grates and blank walls for joining to other units. The landing pad has protective ridge rails, collector tiles, doors, stairs, and a number of terraced top openings and doors. The unit also has side windows in different configurations, an opening that could be for a cross street bridge (not included) or an air car entrance. The expansion has an equipment room, more solar collection tiles, and a ground floor loading door. Large groundlevel windows give combat troops access to the outside, and there are a number of pedestrian doors at street level.

If an office compound is more your style, you could start with an MT-33 unit and base ($8.50), add an MT-39 extension, and on the other side of the base module place an MT-43 Alternate Ground Level Extension ($6.50). This will give you a 6" X 2" building that makes a fairly impressive structure at under $22.00. These pieces have extensive rooftop detailing, including equipment rooms and elevator towers, so you know that some planning went into the masters.

There are only two complaints that mar an otherwise S-star project. The sidewalk corners are fragile when dropped, but can be reattached with little trouble by most good adhesives. Care should be taken in transportation to conventions or gaming sessions to avoid damage. The other problem is price. It is a shame that there are so many EPA restrictions on resin, or it would be a lot more affordable. As it is, you have to pay a high price (as noted in the column) for the extra possibilities. This is still a good system, and I highly recommend it for gaming in the SF genre.

Mitic-Maria Studios

presents Architectural Treasures 11353 Pyrites Way, Suite 2 Rancho Cordova CA 95670

When you think of castles, most people think of imposing structures with solid stone walls. We tend to lump all the fortresses, guard towers, keeps and outposts under the same heading. The truth is that few fortifications used in everyday life had "solid" walls, Most walls were sandwiches of packed clay or dirt with stone covering both outside surfaces. Many small cities started out as fortifications placed at a strategic spot, and grew larger over the years by adding walls and posts. The walls were often rough cut and fit together poorly in places, since governments could not afford stonecrafters and masons to work on every project. This modular construction has been available to miniaturists for years, but the product was often expensive and difficult to work with due to restrictions on glues and paints. To fill an open niche in the market, Mitic-Maria Studios has introduced a line of lowfired ceramic pieces that you can blend into any kind of fortification or structure you want. I took the pieces sent for review and designed the early equivalent of a toll booth, meant to restrict traffic on a certain road in a club's fantasy campaign.

I started with the Kings Gate House (#105B, \$24.00). The structure is 33/4" wide,  $3\frac{1}{2}$ " deep, and 7" tall. It come two halves with ceramic floors for each of three stories (not including the ground). The floors and ledges are big enough to hold a Games Workshop hex base, and ceilings are tall enough for 28 mm figures except right at the beams. There is room for up to 18 troops to be hidden. The door is recessed into the front wall, and the arrow loop in the floor will help deny access. The gate opening is  $1\frac{1}{2}$  wide and 21/4" high, allowing a 28 mm mounted man to fit through as long as his lance is not vertical. The back half-floors have trap doors molded into them. Doorways line up with wall walkways, and you can exit either side of the tower. The advantage is that if the tower is being attacked from both sides, you can separate the halves and fight each battle separately. The disadvantage is that the towers have a slight separation, and you can tell they are halves unless you sand the bottom slightly.

Geo-Hex Scenery

Architectural Treasures (Mitic-Maria)

The fronts on all wall sections depict rough stone work with some separation where mortar has weathered out. The tops show brickwork on each half, but clearly exhibit the dirt used for the center of the wall, sculpted with what look like wear paths and slight potholes. The wall is constructed of three #103 curtain walls (18 scale feet; $3.00 each) which offset the Horsemen's Gate (#107; $4.00) in the rear and the Postern Gate (#106; $4,00) to the left of the Gate House. Each side wall is a 36-foot curtain wall section (#102; $4.00). The wood barding and enclosures were produced from a pattern that is available from the manufacturer (ask for it). The supports are regular kitchen matches placed into drilled holes that have been squared. The actual boards are sheet balsa with the nails and boards drawn on. The fortess was finished using four curtain wall corners (#104, $3.00) and accessed by a curtain wall stair piece (#117, $3.00). The total cost of this 14-by-10³/4" fortress is $72.00, not including shipping, matchsticks and balsa wood, and whatever paint you use.

Low-fired ceramics drink up paint. While the folks at Mitic-Maria painted this unit to appear to have been well used and abused, it will still absorb almost any paint or ink made, so you can paint and weather to taste. This adds to the versatility of the concept. Because the pieces are separately cast and fired, it is inevitable that there will be some space between wall parts. If you can overlook this, then this is a definite 4½ star product, and I highly recommend this line.

3006 Minotaurs of the Horned Gods

Minotaurs have always been portrayed as creatures of power and physical strength. Ancient legends tell of a minotaur that controlled the mazes of Crete, while the DRAGONLANCE® books and stories detail their exploits as valuable allies of the Dark Queen. The six luminite figures in this set personify this power in their aggressive stances.

The figures appear to be scaled for the larger 28 mm scale now available from most companies, but could easily be used as leaders in true 25 mm scale. Each figure is between 35 mm and 45 mm in height, depending on how the figure is posed. Each piece has well-muscled humanoid legs that end in cloven hooves. Oval bases with no surface detail support the figures and allow you to detail each figure to taste. Every minotaur is armed and positioned differently, but all the faces have a defiant glare.

The first minotaur clutches a trident in both hands as he moves forward. A strap with a ring stretches across his chest and back and supports a full pack with buckles from which extends a horn. A smaller provision sack on his right side is also anchored to this strap and maybe to the fleece unevenly draped around the midbody. A sheathed two-handed sword rests on his back between the back skin and bag. His wrists each have bracers, and the only ornamentation appears to be the gold bracelet on his left arm and the ring on his low-slung horns.

The second minotaur has horns that resemble a goat's. He is armed for battle with a two-handed sword clutched tightly in his right hand. His left hand supports a plain oval shield, with the rivet detail on the supporting straps clearly evident. Both wrists sport bracers, while twin straps support a small buckler type shield that acts as chest protection. A belt and buckle support a loincloth, and his only jewelry appears to be teeth on a throng around his neck and an ankle bracelet with spikes. Muscle detail is excellent, as is a hairy ridge on his back that will challenge a painter and enhance the model.

Minotaur number three appears to be stepping up to the plate, but his bat is a large spiked club. A studded leather belt supports a brass-tipped, chain-hung horn on his left hip and the tattered cloth that hides his groin. Coarse, bristly fur covers the torso and neck, while muscles show in sharp relief. Decorations include coppertipped horn ends and rings, a necklace of teeth, an arm band, and a set of straps by the right hoof.

The fourth minotaur waves his studded mace over his head. His body is protected by laminated armor over chain in front and torn and tattered chain mail in the back. The waist belt that secures this armor also supports a long thatch of hair. His armor is further augmented by the large oval shield emblazoned with the raised image of the "Great Horned God," and a large metal bracer on the right arm. Jewelry consists of a tooth necklace and a gold band around the right leg.

Minotaur number five is a two-handed fighter, with a bracer on only the left wrist. The chest plate is supported in the back by straps and loops that crush the coarse, curly hair and also act as a support for the groin protection. A girdlelike belt hints at extra power and supports a capped horn. His jewelry consists of a large gem on a thong, metalized horn tips (also good for gouging) and an arm bracelet. This figure looks even more belligerent that the others.

The last minotaur easily could be a leader. His front is covered in a laced mail, and the detail is so good that you can see the laces if you examine the figure closely. Metal shoulder guards and leather strips give an appearance of a "bullish" Roman, even with the different types of armor present. Straps with buckler cross the chest and secure a knapsack onto the leather rear armor. A sack and a short sword dangle from the ornate belt. His right arm supports a square shield and a thin bracer. The left forearm is encased in wide support and the hand wields a large double-bladed axe with a symbol of the Great Horned God on the center of the axe held our at his side. He is obviously not amused.

These figures will work as single monsters, as a minotaur unit for WAR-HAMMER FANTASY,* or extra-large figures for an AD&D® scenario. This set is an excellent value at the suggested retail price of $19.00 a box

Gren 1575 KILL ZONE* game * * * * * */2

The KILL ZONE game is a miniatures combat game based on a war-ravaged, near future period. The game contains counter sheets, five six-sided dice, a quick reference sheet, rules and ten 28 mm (yes, I know the box says 25 mm) luminite figures with plastic slotted bases packaged in a 93/4" X 73/4" game box. The counter sheet is a one-sided card stock sheet that contains 8 multiples of the available game commands, a movement arrow, suppression counters (shown as sad faces), and a bunch of targeting squares for use with different weapons, The quick reference sheet is a two-sided card that has explanations of commands and weapon hit charts. I highly recommend that you copy the reference sheet, so both sides face you on an 81/2" cardboard sheet, and you will not have to flip back and forth.

The rulebook is 30 pages long, and the only illustrations are in the weapon identification section. The game uses preset orders to determine unit or figure movement and actions, and the size of these groups are determined by the organization list on page two. Terrain, movement modifiers, cover, line of sight, weapon capacity, and orders all affect the chance of hitting. The second half of the rulebook is dedicated to point value charts, weapons, scenarios and roster sheet.

Our playtesting went well, after everyone stopped using the "stay sharp" command every turn. We fought in the overgrown ruins of an old castle, and it was hard for the government player to keep his squad together. The government lost one game because it underestimated the distance when using an assault order and could not engage the scavengers. They died almost to the man, with the scavengers losing only one member. The scavengers used "keep down and snipe" to win the next game (the government came to them; we played blind pre-plot, which was not really in the rules). The government won the last game when they killed the scavenger "leader" and then suppressed the rest of the troops until they were on top of the scavengers.

The figures in the set provide a good mix for a beginning game. The five troop ers are all dressed identically in fatigues, jump boots, knee protectors and a light armor flak vest. The commander is punching orders on a keypad while his assault rifle hangs from a sling on his shoulders. Two troopers are firing their assault rifles, while a fourth trooper triggers off a missile launcher, The assistant leader appears to be ready to throw a grenade. All are equipped with headsets.

The opposition consists of rebels and savages. The rebels have a sniper on their team and he is terribly loaded down with a variety of cups, packs, boxes, weapons and knickknacks. He is also wearing shooter's muffs and a kerchief over his face.

KILL ZONE* game (Grenadier)

The second rebel is armed with an assault rifle and is wearing a shirt, sleeveless denim jacket with dog tags, jeans with cuffs, and jump boots. The bill of his cap is pointed up to the sky, while greased hair sticks our from underneath. His face looks a little like Dudley Doright. The savages include a Mad Max-type character who could be used as a cyborg, complete with fuel and control panel in back, a knife in his left hand, and a length of biker chain clutched in his right hand. We did not play him as a cyborg, but it sure would have tipped the odds. The next savage sports a Mohawk complete with feathers, a light chain groin protector and a sleeveless leather jacket. His eyes are covered by shades, and he is wearing a chain necklace. He is armed with a machine pistol and is at the ready. The last savage is a scantily clad female carrying a heavy handgun in her left hand, a spiked club in her right hand, and feathers in her hair.

The game is extraordinarily easy to play, and there were few arguments during the session. These two facts usually point to a high recommendation for any game. Throw in 10 figures, and the $25.00 price tag is extremely reasonable. My only regret is that the set had no vehicle rules (coming later) or hard cover rules (sniping through slots) for extra protection. All in all, a thumbs up.

FASA 1608 CITYTECH 2nd Edition rules

CityTech 2nd Edition has now officially replaced the original city fighting rules. The set contains two six-sided dice, two 22" X 173/4" hex maps, counters, mech sheets, a rulebook, and two each of eight different plastic mechs. The map sheets have numbered hexes front and back, with the back of each sheet devoid of terrain for city fighting. The fronts are identical and include woods, hills, rough terrain, a lake, and a small city opening done in gray concrete. The two connected counter sheets are also identical and contain vehicle counters, Clan elementals, different Inner Sphere infantry including anti-mech, buildings of all sorts, and fire blocks. New to these sheets are two bridge counters. I also do not remember the mounted counters from my 1st Edition CityTech. The backs of the counters show destroyed versions of the front pictures in black and white. I would immediately take the unpunched counter sheet to a color copier and make several copies, then place the original in a safe place. Over the years, our club has found that the chits never stay where you expect them to stay. Remember that these copies can be made for personal use only!

The rulebook is 87 pages, with only 72 of them being actual rules. Rules flow in a logical manner. The book starts with a brief history, goes through movement into combat, introduces infantry and their role on the battlefield, flows into vehicles, and then into construction. The last pages of the book give technical readouts on the mechs in the game, and some of the vehicles The only fly in this ointment is that by the tenth page you feel like you have read it before-and you have. Much of the rules are taken verbatim from the hardcover Compendium, with only the illustrations changed. This is not necessarily bad, since you can always use an extra set of rules during a large game.

The mechs included with this set are two VTR-9K Victors, two ONI-M Orions, two CN9-D Centurions and a late substitution for the Wolfhound, two JVN-1OP Javelins. Representing the Clan are two Madcats, two Ullers, two Blackhawks, and, last but certainly not least, two Daishi. These mechs were generally a great improvement over the mechs found in the early 3rd Edition BATTLETECH.* The mechs have some flash along the mold joints, and you will need to be careful to remove it all without damaging detail. The plastic mechs are only about five percent bigger than the metal kits (except for the Madcat, which has a much larger nose), and there is no heavy-duty pain in assembly (the feet go which direction?). The detail is not quite as sharp as on metal mechs, and the gun barrels do not have bores, but detail is present. My main complaint is with the Ullers, both of which had broken guns.

This set has some excellent reasons to recommend it, even to long-time players. The plastic mechs can be used when less coordinated friends come over, and you can always use maps when building and scenery props are not available. The boxed set has a suggested retail price of $25.00 and is worth it, considering the components, especially for BATTLETECH novices.

First Quest

sponsible for an important part of my life, as I grew to love the old man, and Bruce and I delighted in taking him out for pizza and spending hours talking politics.

But Quincy wasn't forever. Again I moved (with Bruce), this time to take a news bureau position in Evansville, Indiana. I continued to write to my gaming pals and Ralph-who had managed to get us on the mailing list of every Republican group in the country. In a new city, we turned to gaming again as a way to meet people. We trotted down to the hobby shop and inquired about local campaigns.

It wasn't long before we had our weekends occupied with AD&D sessions, STAR FRONTIERS® expeditions, and VILLAINS & VIGILANTES* slugfests. We discovered the gaming convention scene, as the local club hosted a convention called Glathricon every June. We found ourselves helping with the con, then later running it when the previous coordinator moved to Texas. We'd probably still be involved with the club and the convention if the newspaper I was working for hadn't been sold.

It was time for a new job and a new city again.

An opening had come up in TSR's ROLE-PLAYING GAMES ASSOCIATION™ Network. I was a member of the RPGA® Network, and some friends talked me into applying for the job. I wasn't sure I wanted a job in the game industry – I was a crime reporter, covering disasters and murders-but I decided to journey to the cool climes of Wisconsin for an interview. Harold Johnson, now a creative director for the company, ended up

I said good-bye to my friends in Evansville, promised to keep in touch, and Bruce and I moved to the sticks-across from a dairy farm that gets rather pungent in the summer. (Bruce always has been a good sport about moving when I found an interesting job. He's a chemist, by the way, and he knows more games than I do.)

That move was about eight years ago. Working for TSR was unlike any job I previously had. It was fun, the murders were fictitious, my co-workers were incredibly creative and often-times goofy, and my office was mine to decorate as I desired. (My newspaper editors frowned on my Wookiee glossy and spaceship mobiles.) I had a marvelous time running the RPGA Network, writing tournaments, authoring a few TSR novels, and attending conventions around the country, and down under. The position afforded me an opportunity to make friends from the east to west coasts-and from Canada, Germany, Mexico, Brazil, and Australia.

But after eight years working for the leader in the role-playing industry, I decided it was time for yet another career change, though one that wouldn't take me out of the hobby. I'm a freelance author now, writing novels and game products in a home office with a window that points toward the dairy farm.

I chat with Laura once in a while; she is still running her AD&D game campaign. I keep in touch with other friends I met through the hobby. (I am thoroughly convinced the best way to find best friends is around a gaming table.) I make time to fill a few weekends with AD&D games and STAR WARS* role-playing sessions, I still use Chuck's map; my players have discovered the railroad, but not the train.

Neil Diamond sings in the background from time to time.

And every once in a while I fondly think of Frodyne, a dense werehawk who lead me on a thoroughly wonderful adventure.
